THE ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION.

Of the many Exhibitions of Art and Industry which have followed the Great International Exhibiton of 1851, that which was inaugurated at Manchester on Tuesday last promises to be the most successful. The great deficiency of the Hyde Park Exhibition was in pictures, which were purposely excluded, as inconsistent with the design of the promoters. The Manchester Exhibition, as its name imports, is pre-eminently and exclusively a display of Art, and of its ancient and modern masterpieces. Such a collection was never before brought together; and, until very recent times, would have been impossible. It needed the adaptation of glass and iron to the purposes of architecture, and the invention, in fact, of a new kind of architecture, before the possessors of such rare and costly treasures could be induced to part with them. The result is in the highest degree satisfactory. The collection, in its marvellous richness and beauty, shows that, although the State and the Legislature of this country have done but little to encourage Art, and that, although the people generally have been far behind the other nations of Europe in the enjoyment or appreciation of painting or sculpture, and in their knowledge of the principles of Art in its higher branches, the wealthy and educated classes have not been deficient either in taste or in liberality. Whatever the State has done, or attempted to do, in the matter of Art has been either ill done in itself, or its pecuniary arrangements have been so niggardly as to defeat all useful purpose; and the people, having no good examples before them, have remained almost as ignorant of Art as the Esquimaux or the Kaffirs. Our National Gallery is but small and ill provided, and its best pictures are due to private munificence. Our public statues are a disgrace, hideous and monstrous. There are scarcely three of them in the metropolis that ought not to be sent to the melting-pot or the stone-breaker And whether they be good or bad, it has been necessary to cast them in enduring bronze—to place them high out of reach —or to surround them with iron railings, to protect them from mutilation at the hands of the multitude. The lowest classes of the people in this respect offer a very humiliating contrast with the same classes on the Continent, and, instead of respecting Art, but too commonly take a brutal pleasure in destroying or defacing it. The railings in front of the great entrance to St. Paul's Cathedral bear witness at this moment to the vandalism of the crowd. The Dean and Chapter who granted the privilege or passage through the paved area, where stands the statue of Queen Anne, offer a reward for the discovery of the person or persons who, in abuse of the privilege, mutilated a work of Art, which for Art's sake, if not for the sake of decency and the rights of property, ought to have been respected. But, whatever may be the amount of public ignorance, there are amongst us many wealthy Peers and Commoners, and men who have grown rich in trade or in the professions, who have rescued the national character from the reproach which, but for them, might have been levelled both against the Government and the people; and who have enriched their houses with the choicest specimens, not simply of foreign or ancient masters, but of their living countrymen. With a liberality worthy of all praise they have freely given up these treasures for the purposes of the Manchester Exhibition, and have thus aided a very great and much-needed educational movement.

The Prince Consort, deprived by his peculiar position in the State from interference in those great political questions which stir the passions, sharpen the intellects, and direct the ambition of the most distinguished subjects of the Queen, renders good service to his adopted country by devoting his fine taste and the energies of his mind to questions of Art. Much has been done of late years, and especially since the Great Exhibition of 1851, to direct and improve the public education in these matters; and no small portion of the result is due to the part taken by his Royal Highness in lending the powerful influence of his name, station, and character to the movement. But much more remains to be done to make Art popular; to familiarise the public with its masterpieces, and so to imbue the mind of the nation with the shapes and images of beauty as to cause respect for Art in the first place, and emulation in the second.

When this point shall have been attained, an improvement in the arts of manufacture in tissues, in metals, and other materials will assuredly follow, to the increase of remunerative employment among all classes, and the consequent increase of the general wealth of the nation. When the mutilators of the statue of Queen Anne shall be discovered—as we trust they will be—it will, we venture to predict, be ascertained that they had no acquaintance with the interior of the National Gallery or the British Museum, and that they never joined the pleasant parties of working people who club their pence together to drive to Hampton Court, and visit its suggestive and well-filled picture-galleries. We are as yet but at the beginning. The appreciation, love, and knowledge of Art is but one of the branches of national education; and perhaps the only one in which a personage so highly placed as the Prince Consort can with propriety interfere. Painting, Sculpture, and the Fine Arts generally, have no necessary alliance with questions of creed or of politics; and the husband of the Queen can safely and gracefully mark out for himself a career in connection with them which may be highly creditable to himself and useful to the country. But a temporary show, like that at Manchester, noble as it is, will not extend an influence deep and wide enough among the masses to be of any great utility to those who most need to be instructed. It has been suggested that the Exhibition should be peripatetic, and that it should go to Birmingham, to Liverpool, to Glasgow, to Dublin, and to other large towns and cities. It would be asking too much from private munificence to expect at its hands the transference of its treasures from place to place. But it would certainly tend to the education of the people if the National Gallery were sent on its travels. It is very little seen in London; and if Manchester, or Glasgow, or any other large city or town, would build a convenient palace of glass and iron for the reception of the pictures for three months, we do not see why the nation should not grant them for such a purpose with as much cheerfulness and good will as the noblemen and gentlemen have displayed who have lent their pictures and statues to the men of Manchester. At all events, we throw out the hint for the consideration of those who take an interest in the subject, and who would like to see the bulk of their countrymen as refined in their tastes as they are industrious in their habits, and who would strew some flowers on the pathway of industry, and wean it from amusements which are often degrading, and too commonly unwholesome.

EXHIBITION OF THE PLANS FOR THE NEW PUBLIC OFFICES.

WESTMINSTER HALL has been during the past week the resort of a crowd of amateurs of architecture, and of a more general public, curious to see the result of a competition for the proposed new Ministeria to be erected on the space immediately to the north of Great George-street, which is now occupied by so many obscure lanes, although the site be one of the most precious in London.

Once for all we offer Viscount Palmerston and Sir Benjamin Hall our sincere and hearty acknowledgments for the comprehensive manner in which this large question has been dealt with. We are happy to find that there is to be no repetition of Buckingham House measures—beginning a vast edifice without money and without a definite plan, the upshot of which could be nothing but bungling. Great Britain is the richest empire on the globe: she has one imperial metropolis, and one small quarter of the general capital devoted to her public offices; if, therefore, there are any ten acres on the globe that ought to be covered with externally imposing and conveniently constructed public edifices, they are those adjoining Whitehall.

Nor was Sir Benjamin Hall's summons confined to architectural elevations. Whatever improvements in the quarter appeared feasible to the competitors were to be included in their plans. On this point we will only say that we consider Charing-cross and not the present Westminster-bridge street as the proper point that ought for the sake of general traffic to be connected with the Surrey side by the proposed bridge. Many block plans have been given in accordance with Sir Benjamin Hall's conditions of competition. We do not as yet feel competent to pass an opinion on those plans which have been the result of many an anxious day's and night's cogitation to the competitors; we may, however, be permitted to say that we have great doubts of the feasibility of those that indulge in the luxury of double lines of traffic from Pall-mall and Trafalgar-square, entitled "Royal Way," &c., or those with semicircular sweeps and luxuriant Regent's-park-looking architecture. We have a prejudice in favour of rectangular masses, and of Whitehall remaining as it is, excepting, of course, the widening of Parliament-street.

How far the inventors of the elevations have complied with Sir Benjamin Hall's conditions with reference to construction is a point on which we can offer no opinion on the strength of a single morning spent in the Exhibition; we can only apply at a first examination the general laws of beauty in proportion. In this respect we unhesitatingly give the first place to No. 147, with the motto "England expects every man to do his duty." It is of renaissance architecture, and unites great distinctness of demarcation (a quality much wanted in extended frontages) with harmony of masses and exceeding elegance of details, without crowding so as to create eyesore, or without an expenditure of elaboration of detail useless and incommensurate with normal optical powers. We believe that few or none of our leading architects have competed; if, therefore, No. 147's talent for construction be equal to his eye for elevation, we congratulate the country on a new rising architectural talent.

The south elevation of No. 23 is exceedingly noble and simple, the style Italian. But why are the lateral pilasters of the two first-floor centre widows hidden by the tall columns, when a single clustered window would have saved this inelegance? In other respects the central pavilion is magnificent in the felicity of its relation to the other lines of the elevation.

Some designs, evidently by French architects, remind us of the Hôtel de Ville, old Le Raincy, the Tuileries, &c. In a picturesque line of roof no man, modern or ancient, ever matched dear old Philibert Delorme, and that his school is not extinct may be seen in No. 89. Here the ridge line is both practical and picturesque, and the skylights excellent. But, surely, those masses of banded pillars are unnecessarily heavy.

Worthy of honourable mention are also No. 18, a noble Italian structure, but the cupolas crush the façade; No. 19, also Italian, and of great elegance, but the central entresol pilasters do trop; No. 22, full of elegance, but defective in climax or saliency; No. 42, a grand Inigo Jones sort of composition, but too gorgeous a dream ever to be realised, except at a prodigious cost; No. 136, the War-office, elevation most unexceptionable; Nos. 148 and 149, worthy of much attention, but, we think, not equal by a long way to their neighbour, the already-mentioned beautiful No. 147.

PROGRESS OF FREE-TRADE IN ITALY.—The Pontifical Government has just enlarged and completed that reform by introducing a tariff of charges on a great number of articles of consumption. It reduces upon silks, linen and cotton goods, on which a duty of 25 per cent is now levied, has been reduced to half. On the importation of goods weighing 50 kilogrammes, which used to pay 50 francs per cwt. as import duty, will now have to pay only half the sum. The duties on cotton cloths, which stood at 6 baj., are reduced to 3 baj., and those on articles of fashionable attire, in which France possesses the entire trade, have been lowered one-half, from 40pc to 20pc. Such a reduction is an evidence of the advantages secured to the Papal Treasury by all first experiments in this direction.—Letter from Rome.

OVER THE WATER.

DUKE CONSTANTINE, in Paris, is making the usual tour. Of course, he is particularly interested in everything; but more especially, we are assured, in the Musée de Souverains at the LOUVRE. Here his Imperial eyes have fallen upon the old St. Helena hat, and the ragged boots of poor Marie Antoinette. But undoubtedly the subject of conversation in Parisian salons during the week has been the death of poor Alfred de Musset—a warning, let it be noted, to absinthe-drinkers. He is a great loss to modern letters in France: may the dust lie lightly upon his grave! He will soon be forgotten; for in giddy Paris who is long remembered? A sentiment—cards of condolence—perhaps a tea—and lastly a speech—and all is past. The Boulevards claim the mourners. "The whirligig of time" is so fierce a whirligig now-a-days! From the author who is dead, to the living worker, the world turns rapidly. The gossip lightly turns to Halévy and his new opera, "La Magicienne:" the libretto by M. St. George; principal vocalists, Mesdames Lauters and Borghi-Mamo. The scenery is to be all that the artists of the Grand Opera can do in their most inspired moments; the costumes are to dazzle even the Parisians. If the preparations for the "Magicienne" occupy the serious attention of the cafés, that of a novel theatre for the Rhine, by a M. Weiss, amuses them. Already they are speculating on the manager's chances of success; while the comic journals are making suggestions. The theatre will, of course, be admirably adapted for marine pieces. Its playbills will announce that it will anchor off Mayence on Thursday, and Cologne on Sunday; that the performances will begin at seven—wind and weather permitting. The theatre's crew can also be turned to account as supernumeraries; having let the anchor fall they can become Tyrolean peasants. More; if the speculation become desperate, it has been suggested that M. Weiss may afford his audience the recreation of fishing between the acts. Then the Russian Director-General of Theatres is on his way to Paris, possibly to offer thousands to the stars of the Variétés and the Grand Opera. Great excitement; but still the Presse writes on the Anglo-French alliance.

It is whispered—but that is, it is gossipped loudly enough in cafés—that the Russian Duke is not very pleased with his visit; and that he and Prince Napoleon (who does not care to conceal his anti-Muscovite ideas) are at variance; while the Emperor is striving, in the interests of the nation, to be friends with everybody. But this gossip simply fills the gap in news under which all Europe appears to be labouring at the present moment. The proposed changes in the Bank of France, and the accord between old antagonists like M. Emile Pereire and Baron James de Rothschild, at the recent meetings in the Palace of the Tuileries, have been excitedly canvassed, of course, on the Place de la Bourse and in the Chaussée d'Antin; and sufficient evidence has been given, it is believed, to lead to a considerable modification of the original bill. The floating debt of France must be reduced. Still the light comedy that floats ever about the Boulevards soon turns men from the consideration of even the gravest subjects—from floating debts and bloody revolutions to the ankle of the last danseuse, or the latest absurdity of a favourite of the public; or else some wonderful dinner, or some curiously-turned thought, goes the length of the Boulevards, and wanders afterwards even to the students' hotels, round about the Panthéon, where Triboulet and his kindred contemporaries are in high renown.

Of these essentially Parisian anecdotes take the following as a recent specimen. Two friends are dining. Some melon is produced. The friends, not being blessed with unfathomable conversational resources, proceed to discuss the question whether a melon is a fruit or a vegetable. The argument grows warm, so warm that a bet is offered and accepted. Then an umpire must be chosen. Well, the waiter is perhaps the fairest. He is forthwith summoned. The more confident of the disputants turns to the chosen umpire, and blandly asks the important question—"Waiter, is the melon a fruit or a vegetable?" "Monsieur," replies the learned naturalist, "the melon is a hors d'œuvre."

French art is making its way across the water. It is reaching England and making its stand. We have French exhibitions, and we have collectors in England who are beginning to recognise the genius of Decamps and Meissonnier. Liverpool, too, is Jeannon's chief patron. Then at Manchester, in the Art-Treasures Exhibition, amid the treasures sent, in the Hertford Gallery are a fine Decamps, with one of his wonderful white walls; "Landscape and Cattle," by Rosa Bonheur; "Napoleon Crossing the Alps," by Paul Delaroche; a "Camp Scene," by Horace Vernet; a specimen of Troyon's landscape; "Landscape and Cattle," by Auguste Bonheur; a "Painter of Louis XIV.'s Time," by Meissonnier; and fine samples of Ary Scheuffer. There is only one point to urge in connection with this visit of foreign artists in their works, viz., that they shall be fair towards English painters, and welcome them, in their works, to Paris. The French insist that England produces no art worthy their regard, but they speak in ignorance—even after the Exhibition of 1855—or with prejudice. We shall be glad to learn, next year, that many of our artists have found their position in the salons over the water.

In the notice of the opera "Adriana Lecouvreur" in our Journal of the 25th ult., the composer's name was misprinted Pera: it should have been M. Vera.

THE WAR IN CIRCASSIA.—Private letters from Russia bring accounts of the war in the Caucasus. In addition to the movements already mentioned on the part of the Trans-Kubanian tribes, a resumption of hostilities had taken place on the right wing of the line of the Caucasus. About 100 montagnards crossed the Kouban, which was frozen over. They were followed by 1000 cavalry and infantry. Their first attack was on a picket of Russian cavalry, which would have been overpowered had not reinforcements come up in time, and the Tcherkesses were compelled to retreat with loss. General Dehn had made an expedition against the tribe attached to Mehemed Amine. He commenced by concentrating five battalions of infantry, 800 Cossacks, and ten pieces of artillery, and with this force he crossed the Laba. In twenty-four hours he arrived at the Aouels-Koutschouts-Khabel, situated in the midst of woods and swamps. The Tcherkesses, thinking their position unapproachable, felt secure, when they were suddenly attacked by the Russians and, in spite of an obstinate resistance, defeated, and a great number of prisoners taken, and also several killed. Their stronghold was destroyed, and all their cattle driven off. The Russians went through immense fatigue to accomplish this successful coup-de-main.

THE SLAVE POWER IN NEW YORK.—A prospectus has been issued for a new weekly paper in New York, to be called the Southern Herald, and to be devoted to the furnishing of information "concerning the politics of New York merchants." The following paragraph from the prospectus indicates the spirit in which it is to be conducted:—"We acknowledge no fellowship or equality with Abolitionists, and our whole energies will be directed against them, both in a social and business point of view." A Kentucky paper, in noticing this sheet, says that those "who feel more interested in learning whether or not New York merchants are sound upon the negro question than they do in ascertaining where they can get the best goods, and get them cheapest, will find it much to their advantage to subscribe to this new sheet."

THE REV. C. NASH, the founder of the Westminster Reformatory, has died in New Zealand, to which he recently went out. An account of his philanthropic exertions in Westminster, with views of the Reformatory, and Mr. Nash's portrait, will be found in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for Jan. 28, 1854.

The Russian squadron commanded by Admiral Behrens is expected at Algiers towards the end of May.

THE WAR IN PERSIA.—CAPTURE OF MOHAMMERAH.

The following telegraph despatch has been received from Sir James Outram, dated CAMP BEFORE MOHAMMERAH, March 28.

Mohammerah was captured by the British on the 26th inst. The enemy lost 200 killed and wounded, among whom was Asberlaf Brigadier, besides seventeen guns, and a vast amount of ammunition and military stores.

The Persian army, under the Shah Zadah, retreated towards Ahwaz and Shuster in great disorder.

The British forces are encamped near Mohammerah.

Our loss in killed and wounded is about ten.

The Arab tribes are friendly, and are sending in their submission.

The following further telegraphic message has been received from Sir James Outram through Constantinopla—

The flying expedition to Ahwaz returned to Mohammerah on the 4th inst. (April) completely successful.

The large Persian army retired from their position, and retreated rapidly towards Dizful before a British force not 400 strong.

One gun was captured, and extensive military stores were seized and destroyed.

THE EAST.

The Journal de Constantinople of the 27th ult. announces that the tribes had recognised the authority of Schamyl, and were preparing to break the truce made with Russia and join the Circassians. The Sultan has sent the order of the Medjidié to the King of Prussia. Accounts from Athens of the 20th state that the discussion of the budget is advancing; that of the Minister of Public Instruction has been adopted unanimously. The Minister of Finance has presented a customs tariff, based on that of the principal countries in Europe.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

The Borsenhalle of Hamburg announces that the representatives of all the Powers which signed the Treaty of Paris assembled on the 21st ult., at Constantinople, to deliberate on the memoir drawn up by the commission charged to present to the Conference the report on the Principalities. The elections of members of the Divan are adjourned to the 16th June.

The following strange piece of intelligence is transmitted to the Cologne Gazette by a Vienna correspondent:—"The Kaimacam of Moldavia, M. Vogorides, has discovered an original method of putting down political agitation. He has ordained that any man meddling in an illegal manner in internal politics shall be punished by the loss of his mustachios and whiskers."

AUSTRALIA.—CHANGE OF MINISTRY.

The most interesting item of political news received by the last arrival from Australia is the report of a change of Ministry in Victoria. The following account of the new Administration is from the Melbourne Age of the 14th of March:—

On Tuesday last the As-embly met, after the adjournment consequent on the Ministerial defeat, to hear the explanatory statement of the new Premier. Mr. O'Shanassy, in a speech of considerable length, entered into a detail of the various steps he had taken towards the formation of a Cabinet. Ultimately, he had been able to secure the services of the following gentlemen:—

H. S. Chapman, Esq., Attorney-General.
J. V. F. Foster, Esq., Colonial Treasurer.
C G Duffy, Esq., Commissioner of Public Works.
A. F. A. Greeves, Esq., Commissioner of Trade and Customs.
G. S. W. Horne, Esq., Commissioner of Crown Lands and Survey.
J. D. Wood, Esq., Solicitor-General.

These gentlemen, with Mr O'Shanassy himself as Chief Secretary, form the new Administration.

Mr. Chapman was formerly Chief Justice of New Zealand, and more recently Colonial Secretary of Tasmania. Mr. Foster was formerly Colonial Secretary of this colony, and at one time, indeed, acting Governor. Mr. Duffy is too well known to our English readers to require description. Dr. Greeves was one of the leaders in the old Legislature, in which he sat as member for the city. Mr. Horne is a legal gentleman of high character and respectability, brother to the present Chief Justice of Tasmania. Mr. Wood is one of our ablest lawyers, and was offered the Solicitor-Generalship a fortnight before, by Mr. Haines, and refused. It will thus be seen, with respect to social position, as well as ability, the new Ministry is a vast improvement upon the old.

Since our last summary the markets have been glutted by excessive arrivals from England, and the prices have been inordinately depressed.

AMERICA.

By the Royal mail steam-ship Niagara, which arrived at Liverpool on Monday morning, we have news from New York to the 21st ult.

A telegraphic despatch from Washington, at Boston, states that instructions had been sent by the George Law for the United States' troops at the Isthmus to hold itself in readiness for any emergency that might arise. It was understood that the United States' steamers in the West Indies would also proceed at once to join the forces at the Isthmus.

It was said Government would make one more effort to arrange the pending difficulties by negotiation; but, failing this, the United States will proceed to take possession of both sides of the Isthmus.

Diplomatic relations had been suspended with the Granadian Government. The British and foreign Ministers at Washington had been informed of the intended demonstration by the American Government.

A despatch, received in Washington from New Orleans, but not credited at the Mexican Legation, stated that President Comonfort had accepted the Tehuantepec route.

The Washington correspondent of the Herald states that it had not been decided whether the newly-appointed Minister to China, William B. Reed, of Philadelphia, would proceed directly to the scene of his labours by sea, or go via London and Paris, and thence by the overland route.

A policeman named L. P. Hardenbrook, of the Ninth Ward, New York, was assassinated on the 15th ult. by one of two burglars whom he had arrested, they having broken into a clothing-store at No. 395, West-street. The assassins succeeded in effecting their escape. The board of councilmen on Wednesday evening adopted resolutions requesting the Mayor to offer a reward of 1000 dols. for the apprehension of the murderer, and directing inquiry as to what relief from the Treasury should be extended to the widow and orphan of the deceased.

The steam-ship Black Warrior, from New Orleans and Havannah, arrived at New York on the 19th ult. A number of outrages, committed by negroes during Lent, are mentioned. The United States' ship Saratoga was in port. A Spanish war vessel, in practising with ball, drove a few of the missiles into the deck of the British cruiser Mariner. An investigation was ordered. It was said that the troops expected from Spain would not operate against Mexico, but go to aid Costa Rica in her struggle against Walker and Anglo-Saxonism.

THE FRANKLIN EXPEDITION.—The public announcement of the measures taken by Lady Franklin for the equipment of an expedition at her own cost to ascertain the fate of her husband and his party was made on Monday evening to the Royal Geographical Society, by the President, Sir Roderick Murchison. The Admiralty have declined giving any assistance to this noble undertaking (even the loan of the Resolute has been denied), the sole noble and personal friends of Lady Franklin have openly come forward with the subject of their names and subscriptions, in testimony of their sense of the necessity of the step she has resolved upon, and for the honour of the nation. Lady Franklin has completed the purchase of the Fox, a very fine, large, steam-yacht, built at Aberdeen, and is now completing her, for the voyage. This vessel belonged to the late Sir Richard Sutton, Bart., and was intended for the fiords of Norway, but was scarcely completed at the moment of his death. She is strongly built, her outer timbers being of teak, and will carry a crew of thirty men, with abundant stores, provisions, and fuel. The command of the expedition has been accepted by Captain M'Clintock, whose name as an Arctic navigator is foremost in the search for Sir John Franklin's expedition. Captain M'Clintock has become a most important part in every enormous extent of coast line has been traversed, and he therefore richly deserves the opportunity of achieving the crowning result of his former toils and perils. Captain M'Clintock's past history and acknowledgments are the best guarantee to Lady Franklin that the costly sacrifice she now makes of that fortune which would have enabled her to spend the remainder of her days in the enjoyment of that ease and those luxuries which belong to her position will not be made in vain.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE decease of the amiable Duchess of Gloucester is an event in recognition of which, in other days, Court etiquette would have demanded the sacrifice of any arrangements in which the mere people were concerned. But a wiser and larger policy now prevails, and the Prince Consort has not only seen fit to attend at Manchester for the inauguration of the Art-Treasury during the interval between the demise and the funeral of the Duchess, but has abstained from passing the fact sub silentio, and has made specific allusion to it, and to his conviction that, in so attending, he was fulfilling what would have been the wish of the deceased lady herself. Straightforward good sense has characterised the whole proceeding, and it will be no unkindly remembrance of the departure of the venerable Princess that will blend with the people's reminiscence of the Manchester inauguration. The proceedings at that ceremonial will be noticed with the utmost interest, as will the subsequent attendance of the Prince at Salford to witness the unveiling of a fine statue of the Queen, erected by the joint subscriptions of the public, and of the 80,000 school children whom her Majesty met at her visit to Salford a few years ago.

Parliament, after the Commons had elected their Speaker, passed a week in the usual preliminaries, and met for business on Thursday, when the Royal Speech was delivered by Commissi on. It will be found in another part of our columns. Not much more than two months, after deducting the Whitsuntide recess, remains to the probable Session, and it is earnestly to be hoped that business will be at once taken up in business-like fashion, and that as little speechification as possible may interfere with legitimate debating. Mr. Thornely, in seconding the Speaker, was plaintive on this head, and remonstrated against orations that kept members out of their beds at unreasonable hours. Such plaints remind us of a character in one of Mr. Disraeli's novels, who is rather contemptuous at the effeminate and go-to-bed habits of modern legislators. "In my time," he said, "we used to have few adjourned debates; we used to fight the matter out, like gentlemen who had been accustomed to sit up late; and we used to go and sup at Watier's afterwards." But in those days Government had not artfully contrived to turn the members of Parliament into unpaid public officers, and keep them at hard work all day in committee-rooms, doing work much of which would more legitimately fall upon paid officials.

We are continuing to ratify our peace with Persia in the same remarkable way as heretofore. The British have taken Mohammerah with a loss of 200 to the Persians, seventeen guns, and a vast amount of ammunition and stores; our own loss in killed and wounded not exceeding ten. The large Persian army retreated rapidly before a handful of English. All this, though curious in presence of the fact that a treaty of peace has been actually signed, is far from undesirable, and will leave a powerful impression as to the strength and determination of England where hitherto she has only been known through the interested representations of Russia.

The Grand Duke Constantine is at the Tuileries, being feted by the Emperor. Prince Napoleon maintains his hostility to the Admiral, and justifies all that was said by the press, and subsequently contradicted by authority, touching the refusal of the Prince to be employed in receiving the illustrious stranger. It is not often that distinguished persons permit their likings and hatings to be palpable to the outside world. The little speeches of the Grand Duke are assiduously collected. The last recorded is his saying to Marshal Pelissier that when the Duke heard that he had taken the command of the French army before Sebastopol, and had selected the Malakoff as the point of attack, the fall of the place was regarded as certain, and it was only a question of time. When the Grand Duke honours us with his presence, we trust he will have something equally polite to say to General Codrington.

A noteworthy case has been heard before the Queen's Bench on a writ of error. A murderer, named Mansell, was sentenced to death at the last winter assizes, but there having been no chance of saving him on the merits, a technical objection was raised, and the argument brought into the Queen's Bench. Maidstone is unfortunately infested with a number of persons who conceive themselves entitled to alter by their own act the law which consigns a murderer to the scaffold, and the prosecuting counsel seems to have been determined that none of these personages should serve—one of them, who frankly intimated his opinions, being actually told by the Judge himself that as he could not "do his duty" he had better stand by. The chief point raised was as to the right of the Crown to challenge, i.e., object to jurors, without at once assigning the reason. Lord Campbell delivered an elaborate judgment, at the outset putting all doubt aside, by deciding that none of the objections raised on behalf of the prisoner were tenable, and Mansell is remitted for execution on Monday week. The result is what those who desire to see a due administration of the law must be satisfied with; and the fair and patient investigation which has been accorded to such a case is in itself matter upon which an Englishman may congratulate himself. A criminal trial, and the discussion of incidental points therein, are among the things which they do not manage better elsewhere—as witness the indecent method in which the miscreant priest Verger was prevented from calling witnesses who might scandalise the Church.

Another case that has excited interest has been disposed of—an election case, in which a clergyman was accused of intimidating certain voters—bakers—by the threat to withdraw his custom and that of a charity over which he presided. The affidavits in reply, though not so precise as they ought to have been, satisfied the Court that the charges were made unfairly, and with misrepresentation, but Lord Campbell would not give costs, because the charity had evidently, in his mind, been used to a certain extent as an influence. The question whether you may, after an election, punish a voter who has offended you—punish him, that is, by withholding your custom—seems to be raised by the discussion on the Intimidation Act; but one has not much fear that the common sense of English people will allow an act intended for a beneficial purpose to be converted into an engine of inquisition and persecution.

"The Napiers," of course, can hardly be out of some squabble or other for a consecutive fortnight. At present we find Sir Charles, the Grand Duke's friend, in disfavour with the great cat's interest, on account of some misunderstanding connected with his recent election; while Sir William, ("Lieutenant-General" as he would, no doubt, think it necessary to sign himself in a lady's album, or at the free-list of the Opera), is refusing to give explanation of charges made in the life of the Napier of Scinde against Mr. Willoughby, M.P., whose polite request for fair play is met by an insolent letter, which convinces the public that, if Sir William had anything else to say, he would have said it. There is fine stuff in the Napier composition, but it is sadly alloyed, especially in the surviving representatives of the family.

The services of both the sons of the great Sir Robert Peel are for the present withdrawn from the Government. The elder, Sir Robert, resigns his Lordship of the Admiralty for reasons not promulgated; the second, Mr. Frederick Peel, not having secured a seat in the House, ceases to be Under Secretary for War, and is succeeded by Sir John Ramsden.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

SIR GEORGE WILLIAM DENYS, BART.

SIR GEORGE WILLIAM DENYS, Baronet, of Easton Neston, co. Northampton, was the only son of the late Peter Denys, Esq., of the Pavilion, Hans-place, Middlesex, by his wife, Charlotte, only daughter of George, second Earl of Pomfret. He was born on the 20th May, 1788; and graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge. He married, the 5th December, 1809, Eliza, eldest daughter of Edward George Lind, Esq., of Stratford-place, London, and Burton, Westmorland, by which lady (who died the 29th June, 1850), he had four sons (of whom three survive him) and four daughters. He served in Parliament as member for Kingston-upon-Hull in 1812, and for a long period was Equerry to the late Duke of Sussex. He was also a magistrate for the counties of Northampton and Essex, and a Deputy Lieutenant. He was created a Baronet the 23rd November, 1818. Sir George Denys is succeeded in his title and estates by his eldest son, George William, late an officer in the 68th Light Infantry, of Draycott Hall, near Richmond, Yorkshire, a magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant for the North Riding, who was born the 11th December, 1815, and who married Catherine Eliza, eldest daughter of the late Michael Henry Perceval, Esq., and has issue. Two of the daughters of the Baronet just deceased are married -viz., the second daughter, Juliana Louisa, to Arthur Montague, Esq.; and the third, Ellen, to the Rev. Frederick Robertson.

THE REV. DR. HOLLAND.

THE REV. SAMUEL HOLLAND, A.M. and M.D., Oxon, Precentor and Prebendary of Chichester, and Rector of Beaudesert, Warwickshire, died at his residence, Regency-square, Brighton, on the 16th ult. The Rev. Doctor was a scion of the ancient family of Holland, Dukes of Exeter and Surrey, and was the son of a clergyman who was Rector of Stifford, and of Mucking, Essex. Dr. Holland was born in 1771, and commenced his education at St. Paul's School, which he quitted with an exhibition for Oxford, where he was elected Scholar and Fellow of Worcester College. He was at first intended for holy orders; but, there appearing no practicable opening for him in the Church, he turned to the study of medicine, took the degree of M.D., and practised for a few years, with success, in London. He married, in 1802, Frances, eldest daughter of the great advocate the Hon. Thomas Erskine (which lady survives him); and when Mr. Erskine became Lord Chancellor, in 1806, Dr. Holland, resorting to his original choice, was ordained, and obtained from his Lordship the Rectory of Poyning, Sussex, where he chiefly resided until 1849, in which year he was allowed by the then Chancellor, Lord Lyndhurst, to cede it to the elder of his two sons, the Rev. Thomas Agar Holland, who is the present incumbent. Dr. Holland's second son, the Rev. Erskine William Holland, is Rector of Dunsfold, Surrey. In 1817 the Bishop of Chichester (Dr. Buckner) conferred upon Dr. Holland a Prebendal Stall in his Cathedral, and in 1825 the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Sutton) appointed him to the Precentorship of the same. Dr. Holland was the author of several excellent clerical publications. He was generally and greatly regarded and esteemed as a learned and accomplished divine, and a worthy, amiable, and high-minded gentleman.

THE BISHOP OF ABERDEEN.

THE RIGHT REVEREND WILLIAM SKINNER, D.D., Bishop of Aberdeen, and Primus of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, was born at Aberdeen in 1778, and was educated at Waltham College, Oxford. He received Deacon's orders from the hands of Bishop Horsley, of St. Asaph's, by whom, in 1802, he was ordained a Priest. In the same year he began to officiate as Curate or assistant to his father in St. Andrew's Church, Aberdeen, of which he was soon afterwards appointed joint Incumbent. He was consecrated Bishop of Aberdeen in 1816, took his degree of Doctor in Divinity at Oxford in 1819, and in 1841 was elected Primus of the Episcopal Church in Scotland. The right reverend prelate enjoyed a very large measure of esteem and respect in the Church over which he presided, and was held in general regard by all ranks and classes of the inhabitants of Aberdeen, in the management of whose charitable and benevolent institutions he ever took an active part. His died at his residence, 1, Golden-square, Aberdeen, on the 16th ult.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR R. G. HARE CLARGES.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR R. GODDARD HARE CLARGES, K.C.B., who expired on the 18th ult. at his country seat, Hurstbourne Park, Hampshire, was the son of the Rev. J. Hare; but on inheriting a few years ago, in right of his mother, the daughter of Mr. Christopher Clarges, a younger son of Sir William Clarges, Bart.—he took that name in addition to his patronymic. Sir Richard was educated at Rugby, and shortly after leaving the school he entered the army in 1796. He saw considerable service in the Peninsular War, where he acted as Assistant Adjutant-General of a Division of the army under the Duke of Wellington, and took part in many of the struggles with the enemy, having received the silver medal and eight clasps for Corunna, Busaco, Barossa, Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajos, Salamanca, Pyrenees, and St. Sebastian; and also received the gold medal and a clasp for the battles of Nivelle and Nive. In July, 1852, he was appointed Colonel of the 12th (East Suffolk) Regiment, and last year was made a Knight Commander of the Order of the Bath.

ROBERT BICKERSTETH, ESQ.

THE distinguished surgeon, Robert Bickersteth, Esq., who died at his residence in Rodney-street, Liverpool, on the 16th ult., was born at Kirkby Lonsdale, in Westmoreland, in 1787. His father, Mr. Henry John Bickersteth, was a medical man there, in extensive practice, and greatly respected. Mr. Robert Bickersteth studied at Edinburgh and London, and he was also an apprentice to the late Mr. Minshull. For nearly fifty years he was in active practice in Liverpool. At the age of twenty-three he was elected Surgeon to the Liverpool Infirmary, which appointment he held for forty years. He then resigned, in consequence of a resolution of the committee limiting the length of service of those afterwards to be appointed. Mr. Bickersteth held a strong opinion that the duties of medical men in hospitals should not be limited to any fixed period, considering that every year of hospital experience increased the value of the surgeon to the public. On his resignation he was made Consulting Surgeon, which office he retained till death. His son, Mr. Edward Bickersteth, now holds the honorary post of Surgeon to the Liverpool Infirmary. Throughout his professional career, Mr. Bickersteth was in the habit of seeing poor people gratuitously every morning. He was, indeed, remarkable as much for unostentatious benevolence and philanthropy as for talent. Mr. Bickersteth married Katharine youngest daughter of the late John Pares, Esq., of Broomhill House, Barnsley, and Sir Kirby Frith, Leicestershire, by whom he has had a family. Mr. Bickersteth's brothers were the Rev. J. Bickersteth, Rector of Sapcote; the late Master of the Rolls, Lord Langdale, and the Rev. E. Bickersteth, of Watton. The present Bishop of Ripon and the Ven. Edward Bickersteth, Archdeacon of Bucks, are his nephews. Mr. Bickersteth's funeral took place on the 22nd ult., at St. James's Cemetery, Liverpool. It was the intention of the members of the medical profession in Liverpool to join the procession in Rodney-street; but, as the family of the deceased were averse to any public demonstration, this project was abandoned. The pall-bearers at the funeral were the Ven. Archdeacon Bickersteth, the Bishop of Ripon. Archdeacon Hill, and Archdeacon Jones.

COULTHARD HEYSHAM, ESQ.

COULTHARD HEYSHAM, Esq., one of her Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the county of Cumberland, died on the 6th ult., at Carlisle, aged sixty-five. He was a gentleman well known in the scientific world. He was the eldest son of John Heysham, Esq., M.D., and inherited in a large degree his father's distinguished talent and ability in the pursuit of natural history. His devotion to the study of entomology, ornithology, and botany was equalled by his sagacity and accuracy of observation; and his collections in those departments are most extensive.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE WEEKLY TRACT SOCIETY FOR THE RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION OF THE LABOURING CLASSES held its ninth anniversary meeting on Thursday evening (last week) in the Lower Room, Exeter-hall, under the presidency of William Garlick, Esq., the treasurer. The report, which was read by Mr. Rowland Elliott, secretary, stated that during the past year the society had been the means of distributing among the working classes of England 1,060,761 copies of its publications, known as the "Weekly Tracts," making a total distributed since the society's formation in 1847 of 11,218,701. This work has been done chiefly by those persons who had become members of the society, by the payment of 1s. or upwards, and who were thereupon supplied every quarter with tracts for distribution to the extent of a half the sum contributed. The receipts were £1188 8s. 6d., and the expenditure £1184 5s. 10d., leaving a balance against the society of £14 6s. 4d. A resolution adopting the report was read, and addresses enforcing the claims of the society were also delivered by the Rev. S. March, and Mr. F. H. Goss, F.R.S.

PERSIA AND THE PERSIANS.—On Monday afternoon, at three o'clock, a very large meeting of persons interested in the knowledge of our relations with Persia and its inhabitants, in consequence of the recent war, took place in the theatre of the United Service Institution, Whitehall-yard, for the purpose of hearing a lecture on the present state of that country, by Colonel Sir Henry Rawlinson. He presented a rather unfavourable picture of the Persian people and army. He represented the inhabitants to be treacherous, and the soldiers to be mutinous. He mentioned a case where, having poisoned their commander, his successor endeavoured to avoid a similar fate by partaking only of eggs; but his precautions were unavailing, and finally he also was made a victim. The regiment then revolted, but was subdued by a superior force and compelled to submit to authority. It was desirable that Europeans should understand the real strength of the Persian army, and the resources at its command; while it was equally desirable to consider the difficulties we should have to encounter in carrying on a war against Persia. For example, all our materiel and munitions of war, mules, &c., should be brought from Bombay. In such a campaign camels, which are easily sustained, would be useless; and the forage required for mules, as well as the food necessary for the entire army, should likewise be brought from Bombay before any attempt could be made to penetrate into the interior of the country. The valleys in Beloochistan and elsewhere by our forces afford no real indication of the difficulties to be surmounted. The passes through the mountains were most difficult of access to any army, and he was satisfied that we should encounter nothing would be likely to prove impracticable. The lecturer then referred to the social and political condition of the Persians, and concluded an interesting discourse amidst the applause of his audience.

MR. APSLEY PELLATT AND THE ELECTORS OF SOUTHWARK.—On Monday evening Mr. Apsley Pellatt, the late member for Southwark, was entertained at a soiree, held at the Lecture Hall, Fair-street, Horselydown, for the purpose of presenting that gentleman with a memorial expressive of the respect of his late constituents for his conduct in public and private life. Mr. W. Haward presided, and in opening the proceedings said that he had watched the career of Mr. Pellatt during the five years he had represented the borough in Parliament, and he was perfectly satisfied that Mr. Pellatt had been actuated throughout his attendance in Parliament by only one impulse and one principle, and that was to do the best he could, not only for their local interests but for the good of the whole community. He then presented Mr. Pellatt with the testimonial, which consisted of an address, conveying in earnest terms the strongest approval of the conduct of Mr. Pellatt both in and out of Parliament. Mr. Pellatt (who was cutinu-iastically received) acknowledged in grateful language this tribute, and said that, with reference to the last vote which he had given on the Chinese question, he was actuated only by conscientious motives (Hear, hear). He was not ashamed to go out of Parliament on that question with such men as Messrs. Cobden, Gibson, Miall, Fox, and the other gentlemen who had voted on the same side as himself. Several addresses having been delivered, reiterating the sentiments of confidence in, and approval of, Mr. Pellatt enunciated in the memorial, thanks were voted to the chairman, and the assemblage, which amounted to 400 persons, separated.

PROTESTANT REFORMATION SOCIETY.—This society held its anniversary meeting at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Tuesday: the President, Lord Calthorpe, in the chair. The attendance was far from numerous. The report detailed the operations of the society in London and the provinces, and stated that the work in which it was engaged was progressing satisfactorily. The financial account showed an income of £3,350 over 1855 of £715. Admiral Vernon Harcourt, the Rev. W. Robertson, the Rev. John Nash Griffin, and the Rev John Drury, in moving and seconding certain resolutions, delivered addresses in support of the society.

NAVAL AND MILITARY BIBLE SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of this society was held on Tuesday, at Willis's Rooms; the Marquis of Cholmondeley in the chair. During the past year 14,229 Bibles and 6573 Testaments had been issued. The receipts amounted to £2128, and the total to 2121; the liabilities to £227, and the stock in hand to £240. The Lords of the Admiralty had given a grant of £20. The Rev Mr. Gleig, the Chaplain-General, bore testimony to morality in the Army being promoted by this and similar societies.

MASSACRE OF FRENCHMEN IN NEW CALEDONIA.—By the Black Dog, which has arrived from Port de France, New Caledonia, we have received intelligence of an attack of the natives on one of the settlements, by which several lives have been sacrificed. The town of Ouarai is distant from Port de France about seven miles, at which place eleven Frenchmen and a number of natives from the Sandwich Islands were stationed for the purpose of obtaining sandalwood. About the 20th January the New Caledonian natives made an attack upon the settlement, and savagely murdered all the inhabitants. So terrible was the onslaught that not a single individual was left to tell the particulars of these dreadful murders. The bodies of eleven white men and fourteen or fifteen islanders were discovered accidentally by parties proceeding from the township. Among the victims of this savage attack is Mr. Bonnet, attached to the firm of Vial D'Aram and Co., of this city, and who has for some time been Commissary-General for the French settlements on the Pacific. The Julia Percey schooner passed by the scene of the disaster during the consummation of this fearful tragedy, and observed an unusual movement on shore, on approaching which the natives were seen to retire, but she was compelled to stand off again.—Sydney Morning Herald.

THE "EUROPEAN" IN SEBASTOPOL HARBOUR.—The European, which arrived from Melbourne with the passengers and mails of the Oneida the other day, was the first ship which entered Sebastopol harbour at the close of the late war. At that time she was chartered by the French Government for the conveyance of troops from Kamiesch Bay. When the captain (William Cubitt) was required to enter by the one passage which the Russians were supposed to have left between their sunken ships, he confined any such unheard-of navigation, unless the European were guaranteed against loss or injury. This having been arranged, the boats were sent a head to explore an apparent channel. The great steam-ship followed slowly. Looking down on either side, those on board saw easily, through the transparent water of the rocky harbour, masts, yards, and rigging, fathoms deep. Presently the whole hulls of the Czar's preserved navy. It was like passing across the Pool below London-bridge in a balloon. The European threaded her way safely to what a few weeks before had been the south part of the allied lines. She had paid a visit to the north side. The Russian officers welcomed the French transport and her company. They expressed their delight in particular at beholding some ladies in it, declaring that they had not seen a female face before for fifteen months.

THE MISSING AUSTRALIAN STEAMER.—News of the safety of the Australian steamer Oneida was telegraphed to all parts of the country on Saturday last, and must have delighted many families. How low the chances of her safety had been rated may be judged from the fact that thirty-two per cent has been underwritten for her gold. Many romanders, if placed in the situation of Captain Hyde, of the Oneida, when his ship had been blown, would have attempted to run in the direction of the prevailing winds in the latitude in which he was, and tried to make Mauritius. In so doing he might have been baffled, and all on board have been starved. It must have been a daring and splendid act of seamanship to take such a miserable sailer as the crippled Oneida back to Australia in the teeth of a head wind. The Oneida was taken on to Sydney, and the only place where it was likely she could get repaired, and probably she will be able to leave Australia in her turn, this month with the mail, and reach Suez about the 22nd of June.

Our Government has presented Captain Cavassa, of the Chilian ship Orient, with a gold medal, for having saved the lives of the crew of the British ship Enterprise.

THE "EAGLET" AND THE "AUCKLAND'S" BOATS DESTROYING MANDARIN JUNKS AT TOON-CHUNG.

THE WAR IN CHINA.—DESTRUCTION OF PIRATICAL JUNKS.

By the latest accounts received from China, in a letter from Hong-Kong, we learn that the Hon. Company's steamer Auckland and small chartered steamer Eaglet went out to cruise on the 14th of February. On the 16th, at Toon-Chung, they fell in with four heavily-armed mandarin boats. The Auckland could not go into the bay where they were, but the Eaglet and the boats from the Auckland went in and destroyed the junks. A battery on the shore, mounting sixteen guns, was captured and the guns spiked. The casualties on our side consisted of one killed and four wounded of the Auckland's men. Her Majesty's steamer Niger was sent out on the 16th, and, in company with the Auckland and boats from her Majesty's ship Calcutta, captured seven piratical junks.

A Correspondent has favoured us with Sketches by an eye-witness of this action, of which we this week engrave two, showing the attack upon the junks, and the burning of the Chinese Commodore's vessel.

Our Correspondent at Hong-Kong states the action occurred on the 15th of February, and the return of the Eaglet to Hong-Kong was on the 14th. The Eaglet's was the first gun on the enemy before they had opened fire, the Auckland not being able to get nearer than the mouth of the harbour.

The first of the accompanying Sketches shows the moment when by a heavy cheer, and giving way as hard as we could pull, the Celestials thought that enough had been done for valour, and devoted their attention to discretion. The next Sketch shows the blowing up of one junk and burning of others. Almost all the guns that had been left loaded were going off as the flames reached them, causing, perhaps, the most dangerous firing experienced in the whole affair.

THE FRENCH EXHIBITION, PALL-MALL

A GREAT reaction has taken place in the mind of the British public with reference to French art of late years. The compositions of David and Guerin, and the portraits of Gerard, were executed on principles so different from those of the British school that they excited no sympathy. Even the greater life and bravura of Gros were expended in the illustration of events that were the objects of our positive antipathy. The Romantic school of France—which is partly the result of our own literature—has altered all this, and engendered, besides, a multitude of genre and landscape painters whose compositions, more cognate to those of the Dutch and British schools, find now as ready a market in this country as across the Channel.

The French Exhibition of 1857 has several interesting works, although the celebrated names of Ary Scheffer, Horace Vernet, and Decamps are, in our opinion, very feebly represented by Nos. 31, 142, and 182; the "Christ" of Ary Scheffer being positively disagreeable in colour, as if the picture were in bad condition; and the "Slave Dealer" of Decamps as well as the "Combat" of Horace Vernet being quite insignificant when we remember what these two men can do. On the other hand, we have to signalise a most charming portrait of Rosa Bonheur, by Dubufe—the lines of intellect given with a masterly effect, worthy of the subject; but we recommend to M. Dubufe greater unity in the light behind the head. In the "Brittany Fisherwomen" of M. Dubufe, sen. (Nos. 41 and 42), we have types of beauty which we suspect to be the exception and not the rule.

Rosa Bonheur comes out with all the force of her genius in No. 11, "Denizens of the Highlands," alias "stots," in a Scotch mist; the expression and technical finish of the brown one such as cannot be surpassed we doubt if equalled—by any living artist. No. 8, "Going to Market—a Scene in Duvergne," by M. Auguste Bonheur, shows, on a larger scale, a mastery of oak copse that reminds us of Rousseau. Both as regards subject and treatment this is one of the most pleasing pictures in the room.

Want of space prevents us from making more than a hasty mention of several high-class pictures. Meissonnier's "Chess-players" (No. 115), in expression, colour, tone, and finish, is as near perfection as any living man can attain in this line. Couture's "Minstrel" (No. 29) is an effort not unworthy of one of the greatest men of the nineteenth century. But is it not a solecism to make impressionable woman only wrapt in admiration, while the much less impressionable masculine nature is dissolved in tears? Troyon is also great in No. 156; so that it would be difficult to say whether we prefer the truthful cattle, or the watery landscape, with sombre, leaden sky.

NEW MARKETS AT MANCHESTER.

THIS edifice, of tasteful design, is now in course of erection in Swan-street, Manchester. It will furnish an evidence, in connection with the numerous handsome and extensive ware houses and public buildings lately erected and now building, of the rapidly-increasing desire on the part of the city of Manchester to possess buildings of a superior architectural character.

The exterior will be built entirely of stone, the walling being of Yorkshire pierrepoints, while the roof, in which a very great amount of decoration is to be introduced, will be of iron, supported upon ornamental columns. A gallery will run round the whole of the inside, in which it is proposed to place stalls for the sale of light or fancy articles, and will be approached by flights of stone steps from the interior.

The view of the interior, from the peculiar form and construction of the roof, will be at once novel and effective. The new building will be erected in front of the Smithfield General Markets lately erected (one of the largest covered areas for market purposes in England), and will be a very great ornament to that part of the town.

MARBLE STATUE OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA, PEEL PARK, SALFORD. M. NOBLE, SCULPTOR.

The design is by Messrs. Isaac Holden and Son, of Manchester, who took the first prize in public competition. It is intended that the building shall be completed ready for use in October next.

PEEL PARK, SALFORD.—STATUE OF HER MAJESTY.

THE addition of a new wing to the Peel Park Museum, and the erection of a Statue of her Majesty in that place of popular resort, excited much interest during the past week. Great preparations were made to give éclat to the visit of his Royal Highness Prince Albert on Wednesday. The inauguration of the statue of her Majesty by her Royal Consort proved an occurrence of a most interesting nature. The spot on which the ceremony was performed vividly recalled the event which the statue is intended to commemorate. The spectacle which was witnessed on the occasion of her Majesty's visit to the Park in 1851 was of too striking a character to be soon forgotten. It was a sight that had never before gladdened the eyes of any Sovereign to gaze on an assemblage of 60,000 children, all Sunday scholars. It was worthy of an enduring memorial, and none more fitting could have been devised than a statue of the august personage whose visit was welcomed by so vast a body of her subjects. Equally appropriate was the manner in which the statue was inaugurated. Preparations on a large scale were made in the park for the accommodation of the Salford Corporation, the Sunday scholars, and the general public. The statue is placed directly in front of the new wing which has recently been added to the Library and Museum. It has been executed in Sicilian marble, by Mr. Matthew Noble, and is 8ft. 6 in. in height. It stands on a pedestal of marble of a similar colour, which is supported on a base of Aberdeen granite. A canopied platform, intended for his Royal Highness and his attendants, with the Mayor and other gentlemen, was erected a short distance to the west of the statue. To the left was the large platform which was filled by those of the public who had been so fortunate as to obtain "green" tickets. The Sunday scholars and their teachers, to the number of 2000, were accommodated on a platform to the east of the statue. The band of the 7th Dragoon Guards was stationed on a small platform erected between these two. The statue was thus surrounded by platforms on every side, except that facing the Library and Museum. This space was specially reserved, in order that an uninterrupted view might be obtained from the building. In the large room of the new wing, which will hereafter be devoted to engravings and models, an extensive stage was erected, commanding an excellent view of the ceremony, and this was occupied by ladies. Immediately outside the building a range of seats was also provided; but these were arranged so as not to interfere with the view of those within. It will thus be seen that the platform accommodation was most extensive; but a vast number of tickets had been issued in addition, available only for the Library and Museum, and for the portions of the Park beyond that in which the statue is located.

Before we describe the inauguration ceremony, it will be interesting to state a few particulars of the new wing of the Salford Museum, in which the Local Art Exhibition was opened by a soirée on the 22nd ult.

The collection of paintings (says the Manchester Guardian) includes not only selections from the works of living and deceased artists who have passed a life-residence in Manchester, but also those who are connected with it by the obligations of birth, or frequent sojourn; an arrangement which not only imparts a more vivid character to the display, but one which is considered absolutely necessary to the presentation of a complete view of the actual progress and patronage of art in this vicinity.

The Exhibition comprises more than 650 objects, all of great interest, which have been contributed by more than one hundred and forty individuals. The walls of several rooms are covered by the beautiful works of art there collected, and the committee have really succeeded in producing a splendid exhibition.

The Mayor explained the origin of the new wing, arising out of the insufficient accommodation afforded by the building before the addition. The local artists had taken advantage of the determination to build a new wing, and had resolved to have an exhibition of the works of art produced in the immediate neighbourhood. With what success they had succeeded the company would be able to judge in the course of the evening. In his opinion the exhibition was a very creditable display, and he anticipated from the gems they now saw that many years would not elapse before they found that they possessed in the district artists of no common celebrity.

The company were then addressed by other gentlemen upon the origin and success of the exhibition; and during the day the Prince of Oude, who had visited the collection in the morning, joined the party.

ELECTION OF A PROFESSOR OF POETRY, OXFORD.—The election of a Professor of Poetry, in the room of the Rev. Thomas Legh Claughton, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, whose term of office had expired, took place in the Convocation House on Tuesday. The contest lay between Mr. Matthew Arnold, M.A., late Fellow of Oriel College, and the Rev. John Ernest Bode, M.A., late Student of Christchurch, both gentlemen of high standing in the University. Early in the day unusual signs of activity were manifest among the resident members of the University, and it soon became evident that the contest was one of great interest. members of Convocation from all parts of the country arriving by every train. The polling commenced at twelve o'clock, and continued—at times with such vigour as to remind us forcibly of the last contested University election—until five, when the poll closed. The result of the election was found to be as follows:—Arnold, 383; Bode, 278: majority in favour of Arnold, 85.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 9, 1857.

ALTHOUGH the speech from the Throne, on the opening of Parliament, will disappoint the ardent Reformers—if any such there be—who expected that the present Administration would take the initiative in a new Reform Bill, the speech of Lord Palmerston promising a Reform Bill for next year, will more than make amends for the omission. It might be desirable that the country should have a Minister more keenly impressed with the necessity of inaugurating reforms propiro motu; but, the case not being so, Lord Palmerston must be taken as he is, as the best, if not the only, Minister to be attained at the present moment. If he do not originate questions of reforms, he has shown that he will not oppose them, if the House, backed by the country, show an earnest desire either to amend the constitution of that assembly, or to extend the suffrage. Lord Palmerston's feeling—and that of a great number of people—seems to be, that notwithstanding the anomalies, absurdities, and defects of our Parliamentary system, its results—though attained in a clumsy and round about way—is a degree of popular freedom not enjoyed in any other country in the Old World or in the New. No one maintains the theoretical perfection of a system by which a new, a wealthy, and an increasing city like Manchester has no greater voice in Parliament than a stagnant village like Lymington, in Hampshire. No one maintains the justice of giving a man the right to vote in a borough because he inhabits a ten-pound house, and refusing a vote to another man equally independent, equally industrious, equally well informed, who lives in a house a mile beyond the limits of the borough, on the ground that he only pays £49 a year rental. But the quiet, easy-going Liberals—aided, of course, by the Conservatives—while admitting all this, and much more, ask of what utility would be an organic change in these or other respects when no change in the theory or system of representation could augment the existing liberty of the people? It is for the young blood in the House of Commons to stir the question. It is for the new men, either under new or old leaders, to organise a Reform party; and, when they have done so, Lord Palmerston will be their very obedient servant. In the mean time there is so much foreign work on hand that Lord Palmerston may be pardoned—seeing what his age and his antecedents are—if he look a little more to his foreign than to his domestic policy. Though we are at peace with all Europe, we are not at peace in Asia; and a Minister with a strong hand and a strong will is needed to carry to completion the work begun in China, and to read the world in that quarter as significant a lesson of British power and determination as has been read to the nations of Europe.

We need not go seriatim through the paragraphs of a speech which is vague collectively and vague in its several parts. Its vagueness, like Sir Roger de Coverley's, has a design in it. How for instance, could her Majesty express the real opinion of her Ministry on the shabby behaviour of the King of Prussia in reference to Neufchâtel? Or how could the Royal Speech enter into particulars as to the present state of the negotiations between Great Britain and the United States on the subject of Honduras? On the Chinese question the few words of the Speech are somewhat more emphatic. But, as strong words are thrown away upon the Chinese, it is to be hoped that the adequate naval and military force of which her Majesty speaks may reach China long before the news of the opening of Parliament, or even before Lord Elgin himself. Negotiations will be best carried on with the Chinese when the British shall have either destroyed or taken possession of Canton.

The Ministerial measures of domestic reform which are promised, during the present Session, branch into three divisions. One includes the consolidation and improvement of the law—by which we suppose its codification is intended. A second applies to the improvement of the laws relating to the testamentary and matrimonial jurisdiction now exercised by those rusty and musty relics of antiquity—the Ecclesiastical Courts;—and the third includes the better prevention and speedier punishment of fraudulent breaches of trust—a net which we trust will be strong enough to catch such delinquents as those of the Royal British Bank. These measures do not make any great show in the Speech; but if they be carried during the short remaining period of the Session, Lord Palmerston and the present Parliament may perhaps get on very well together. But, as regards Reform, although Lord Palmerston has promised it, much depends on the new members. Until a division on some stirring and important subject shows us of "what stuff these are made of," it is not safe to speculate either on the character of the Parliament or that of the Administration.

Any ill feeling that may have existed in this country against Russia has passed away with the war which produced it. The animosities excited were personal, and not national; and when the Emperor Nicholas, whose ambition was the prime cause of the evil, was removed so suddenly and so awfully from the strife which he had provoked, the war lost its bitterness, and was conducted with a courtesy unknown in history. The peace afterwards made was felt to be premature, and the terms on which it was based were seen to be inadequate; but France, and not Russia, was held to blame for the result. The same feelings still exist. Russia is not considered by the people of this country to be a very terrible foe, nor France to be a very reliable friend; whilst the hope is very generally entertained that both of these great nations have had war enough to last them for a quarter of a century.

The Grand Duke Constantine, who during the lifetime of his father and the period between that event and the taking of Sebastopol, was considered the soul of the war party in Russia, is about to visit this country. In France his reception has been brilliant and cordial. We have no doubt that it will be equally cordial in England. As the taste of his Royal Highness is in ships our authorities will be enabled to show him some specimens which he may take a pleasure in examining, and from which he may gain some valuable knowledge, not only in the art of shipbuilding, but of the resources of this country. Our dockyards will be opened for his inspection and examination, with the confidence pervading all classes that the more he knows of us the more he will respect us. If her Majesty be in the humour to prepare a great naval review at Spithead for his gratification, which we hope will be the case, he will be a spectator of one of the grandest sights that the world can offer; a sight, moreover, which cannot but have peculiar attractions to the mind of one who is both a statesman and an Admiral. The Prince knows something of this country. He is said to be an accomplished English scholar, to possess a good library of English books,—and, what is more to his credit, as a man of taste and education—to have read them. Although, in a visit necessarily so short and hurried as that which he is about to make to our shores he will not have the time or the opportunity to study very intimately the character of our people and the working of our institutions, he will learn enough of our power and our resources to impress his mind very forcibly with the value of our friendship and the undesirableness of our enmity. We trust, however, that his visit will not be confined to our arsenals, our dockyards, and our military dépôts; but that, as he travels for instruction, he will be induced to make a tour in our manufacturing districts—to Staffordshire, with its iron and its potteries; to Birmingham and Sheffield, with their manufactures of metals; to Lancashire, with its cottons; and Yorkshire, with its woollens—and that he may see with his own eyes the marvellous wealth of industry which our country affords for the emulation of his own. There is no reason why the late war should sow estrangement between two nations which, in the arts of peace, could so beneficially work together. The Czar would not be compelled to come begging to England for money to make his railroads, if his predecessors had encouraged the mercantile rather than the warlike spirit of his people. Even now, if he would imitate the example set him and all other potentates, by this country, and relax the stringency of his protective, if not prohibitory tariff, he would find in Free-trade a prize better worth his having than the long-coveted provinces of Moldavia and Wallachia, were they ten times as valuable as they are. On every account—political, social, and commercial—people will look with favour upon the visit of the Grand Duke to this country, confident as they are that the enemies of England are those who know her least. He will receive, we are certain, a respectful and, perhaps, a cordial reception wherever he goes—the respect due to the great nation which he represents, and the cordiality excited by the heartiness and honesty of his own personal character. He is the sort of Prince that Englishmen love, one that is not above the business of the profession which he has chosen;—a man who can both work and fight upon occasion, and who trusts to his own eyes rather than to the eyes of other people.

THE COURT.

The Queen and the Prince Consort, with the younger members of the Royal family, left Buckingham Palace, on Thursday morning, at ten o'clock, for Osborne, in the Isle of Wight, where her Majesty purposes to sojourn for a short period previously to commencing the gaieties of the London season.

The Prince Consort came from Osborne to Windsor yesterday (Friday), in order to attend the funeral of her late Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester; but returned to the Isle of Wight last evening.

The Queen held her first Privy Council since her accouchement on Wednesday evening, immediately upon her return to London from Osborne, who went to Marlborough-house on Monday to the purpose of congratulating the newly-married Princess Royal on that event. At the Council, John Evelyn Denison, Esq., Speaker of the House of Commons, Sir John M'Neill, G.C.B., and Frederick Peel, Esq., by command of the Queen, were sworn of her Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council, and took their places at the Board. The Royal Speech to be delivered by the Lords Commissioners at the opening of Parliament on Thursday was submitted to the Queen in Council, and approved.

On Tuesday the ceremony of naming the Queen was performed in the private chapel at Buckingham Palace, by the Hon. the Very Rev. the Dean of Windsor. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, the Princess Alice, and the Marchioness of Ely were present.

Major-General Buckley and Lieutenant-Colonel Ponsonby have relieved Lord Alfred Paget and Captain Du Plat in their duties as the Equeries in Waiting to the Queen and the Prince, and General Sir Edward Bowater has relieved the Hon. Mortimer Sackville West in his duties as the Groom in Waiting to the Queen, and Lord Wilton park is at present Lord in Waiting to her Majesty.

His Royal Highness Prince Alfred, who left Geneva (where he has passed the winter) on the 11th April, arrived at Gotha on the 26th, on a visit to his uncle and aunt, he reigning Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg, and to his grandmother, the Dowager Duchess. After a stay of a fortnight at Gotha and Coburg his Royal Highness will continue his journey to England, where he is expected to arrive about the 20th inst.

FUNERAL OF THE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER

The funeral of her late Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester took place yesterday (Friday) in the mausoleum of the Gloucester family under St. George's Chapel. The Duchess of Athol attends as Chief Mourner on behalf of her Majesty. His Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Cambridge, were likewise present. The Duchess of Nassau, the Hereditary Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and the Princess Mary were also present at the mournful ceremonial. The remains were conveyed by the Great Western Railway to Slough, and escorted thence by the Royal Horse Guards to St. George's Chapel. The interna. fittings of the chapel were the same as on the occasion of the funeral of her late Majesty Queen Adelaide.

The Countess de Neuilly, the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, the Prince of Wales, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent on Tuesday, at Clarence House, St. James's.

Viscount Palmerston gave a state dinner to a large party of members of the House of Commons, at Cambridge House, on Wednesday evening. Her Ladyship will "receive" on Saturday, the 16th inst., and on the following Saturday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

ROYAL COMMISSION.—THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

Shortly after two o'clock the Lord Chancellor, Earl Granville, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Stanley of Alderley, and Earl Spencer, in their robes of state, took their seats on a woolsack in front of the throne. Having been appointed Commissioners to read the Royal Speech. At that time the principal Peers present were Lord Panmure, the Earl of Albemarle, the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Duke of Montrose, Lord Wensleydale, Lord Lucan, the Earl of Harrington, Lord Minto, Lord Redesdale, Lord Ravensworth, &c. The third, fourth, and fifth benches on both sides of the House were occupied by ladies.

Sir Augustus Clifford, Usher of the Black Rod, having summoned the Commons, a large body of members, with the Speaker at their head, appeared at the bar; and the Lord Chancellor then read the Royal Speech, as follows —

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

We are commanded to inform you that her Majesty has availed herself of the earliest opportunity of having recourse to your advice and assistance after the dissolution of the last Parliament; and her Majesty trusts that there will be found sufficient time during the present Session to enable you satisfactorily to deal with various important matters, some of which had occupied the attention of Parliament in the beginning of this year.

We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that the general aspect of affairs in Europe affords a well-grounded confidence in the continuance of peace.

All the main stipulations of the Treaty of Paris have been carried into execution, and it is to be hoped that what remains to be done in regard to those matters will be speedily accomplished.

The negotiations upon the subject of the differences which had arisen between the King of Prussia and the Swiss Confederation, in regard to the affairs of Neufchâtel, are drawing to a close, and will, her Majesty trusts, be terminated by an arrangement honourable and satisfactory to all parties.

The negotiations in which her Majesty has been engaged with the Government of the United States and with the Government of Honduras, in regard to the affairs of Central America, have not yet been brought to a close.

We are commanded by her Majesty to inform you that a Treaty of Peace between her Majesty and the Shah of Persia was signed at Paris on the 4th of March, by her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, and by the Ambassador of the Shah; and her Majesty will give directions that this Treaty shall be laid before you as soon as the ratifications thereof shall have been duly exchanged.

Her Majesty commands us to express to you her regret that, at the date of the last advices from China, the differences which had arisen between the High Commissioner at Canton and her Majesty's civil and naval officers in China still remained unadjusted. But her Majesty has sent to China a Plenipotentiary fully instructed to deal with all matters of difference, and that Plenipotentiary will be supported by an adequate naval and military force, in the event of such assistance becoming necessary.

We are commanded to inform you that her Majesty, in conjunction with several other European Powers, has concluded a Treaty with the King of Denmark for the Redemption of the Sound Dues. This Treaty, together with a separate Convention between her Majesty and the King of Denmark, completing the arrangement, will be laid before you, and her Majesty will cause the measures necessary for fulfilling the engagements thereby contracted to be submitted for your consideration.

GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Her Majesty has directed the Estimates for the present year to be laid before you.

They have been prepared with a careful attention to economy, and with a due regard to the efficiency of the departments of the public service to which they severally relate.

MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

Her Majesty commands us to recommend to your earnest consideration measures which will be proposed to you for the consolidation and improvement of the law.

Bills will be submitted to you for improving the laws relating to the Testamentary and Matrimonial Jurisdiction now exercised by the Ecclesiastical Courts, and also for checking fraudulent breaches of trust.

Her Majesty commands us to express to you her heartfelt gratification at witnessing the continued well-being and contentment of her people, and the progressive development of productive industry throughout her dominions.

Her Majesty confidently commits to your wisdom and care the great interests of her empire; and fervently prays that the blessing of Almighty God may be vouchsafed to your deliberations, and may lead you to conclusions conducive to the objects of her Majesty's constant solicitude—the welfare and happiness of her loyal and faithful people.

The Queen's Speech having been read, the Commons bowed and retired. The swearing in of the Peers was then resumed. Amongst those who took the oaths were the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Earl of Minto, Lord Bonners, Lord Abinger, the Earl of Lucan, Lord Redesdale, the Bishop of Lincoln, the Earl of Effingham, and the Earl of Buckinghamshire.

The swearing was then suspended during pleasure.

The House resumed at five o'clock.

The Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne was moved by the Marquis Townshend and seconded by the Earl of Portsmouth.

The Earl of MALMESBURY said he was unwilling to disturb the unanimity of the House upon the Address to the Crown, and he should, therefore, abstain from any commentary upon the affairs of China, which he would reserve for a future occasion.

Earl GRANVILLE, in the course of some observations, stated that General Outram had received an intimation of the peace with Persia on the 5th of April.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE complained of the attacks made upon General Ashburnham by his brother and inferior officers.

Lord PANMURE defended the conduct of General Ashburnham.

Earl GREY also deprecated those attacks upon the General, which he thought were highly disgraceful to the service.

The Earl of ALBEMARLE expressed his regret at seeing no mention of Reform made in the Royal Speech.

After some further conversation, the Address was agreed to, and their Lordships adjourned a few minutes after seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at a quarter before four o'clock.

TRANSPORTATION.—MR. HAYTER, on the part of the Government, gave notice that the Secretary of State for the Home Department would on to-morrow bring forward a proposition to substitute other punishments for transportation; and that the Secretary for the Colonies would on the same day bring under consideration the question of the Territories under the government of the Hudson's Bay Company.

THE BANK ACTS.—MR. HAYTER also gave notice that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would on Monday next move for a Select Committee to take into consideration the Bank Act of 1844, and the Bank Acts relating to Ireland and Scotland. The said Committee would also on the same day move for leave to bring up a bill for the better regulation of banks, with a view to bring in a bill for their better regulation.

THE JEWS.—MR. HAYTER gave notice that on Thursday next Lord John Russell would move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the oaths taken by members of Parliament (Cheers).

BLEACHES OF TRUST.—MR. HAYTER further gave notice that on Friday, the 15th inst., the Attorney-General would move for leave to introduce a bill to make breaches of trust criminally liable.

INSURANCE AND MUTUAL COMPANIES.—MR. HAYTER likewise intimated that on the 14th inst. the Secretary to the Treasury would move for leave to bring in a Bill for the Incorporation of Insurance and Mutual Companies.

ASSAULTS ON WOMEN AND CHILDREN.—MR. DILLWYN gave notice that on the 12th inst. he would call attention to the state of the law relating to aggravated assaults on women and children.

REFORM.—MR. ROEBUCK gave notice that on Thursday week he would submit a motion, to the effect that the representation of the people in that House was not satisfactory, and required that as soon as practicable a remedy should be applied.

THE SALE OF BEER.—MR. HARDY gave notice for an early day of his intention to ask leave to introduce a Bill to Regulate the Sale of Beer.

THE BALLOT.—MR. H. BERKELEY renewed his motion for the adoption of the Ballot at Elections.

THE ADDRESS.

The Speech from the Throne having been read by the Speaker,

MR. DOBSON moved the Address in reply, defending the conduct pursued by the Government, regretting, however, that the difference with China had not been adjusted. He trusted that the course adopted of sending out a Plenipotentiary of such well-known ability and discretion as Lord Elgin, and supporting him by an adequate naval and military force, would be successful. In reference to the Estimates, he hoped that care had been taken to combine economy with efficiency.

MR. BUCHANAN, in seconding the Address, said he concurred in all the sentiments expressed by the mover. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had appealed to the country against the decision of the late Parliament upon the Chinese question, and the country had given a verdict against that decision by a great majority. The people of England, in fact, could not understand the reasoning of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Cobden, and other gentlemen upon the question, and had sanctioned the course pursued by Government. He hoped that the inquiry into the Bank Acts would be a close and searching one.

General THOMPSON protested against the supposition that the verdict of the country had been given in favour of the Government on the Chinese question, and said that the feeling of the country would not be quieted.

Lord R. GROSVENOR said they all had come fresh from their constituents, and must, therefore, be aware of their feeling. For his own part he knew that among his constituents there was a strong feeling in favour of Parliamentary reform, or, in other words, an extension of the franchise. He had himself been the means of carrying two useful reforms the one the limitation of polling in counties to one day, and the other the putting an end to treating. He was, therefore, perhaps, not an unsafe guide, and would propose, if necessary, to abolish the payment for the conveyance of voters to the poll by candidates, and also the payment by candidates for the expenses of hustings. Various reforms were necessary, but he hoped the Government in the short Session before them would not enter upon such an important subject, which it would be detrimental to, if hastily considered. He hoped the Government would introduce a bill upon the subject of Church-rates, but if not he was prepared to introduce one himself to which he had given much consideration

MR. EWART enforced the necessity of reform in the representation, as well as other reforms.

Lord PALMERSTON said that there were a few points upon which it was necessary to say a few words upon the part of her Majesty's Government. The Government had under consideration arrangements for establishing a department of justice, in accordance with the purport of an address agreed to last Session, which he hoped soon to lay before the House. Considering the short period to which the present Session must necessarily be restricted, it would, he thought, be highly inexpedient to introduce any great measure of reform which could not be at once settled; but at the same time he hoped that the commencement of the next Session to introduce a measure to remedy the defects of the Reform Bill, and to give the franchise to a large class of persons who were now without it (Hear, hear). He hoped the House had sufficient confidence in her Majesty's Government to leave the matter in their hands until next Session without asking for promises and statements which might create great disappointment; but, if the House had not that confidence, it had better say so at once (Laughter). With regard to the question of Church-rates, it was under the consideration of the Government, and he hoped to propose a measure which would be satisfactory to all parties (Hear, hear).

MR. ROEBUCK accepted the noble Lord's pledge to bring in a bill upon the subject of Parliamentary Reform, and withdrew his notice of motion given at an earlier period of the evening.

The motion was then agreed to, and the House rose at a quarter past six o'clock.

The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the Tables of Mr. Glaisher. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The amount of the wind is given by the Recording Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

Wm. THOMAS READ, Secretary.

The Rev. William Anthony S. Greene, F.M.[illegible] Rector of [illegible] and the personalty [illegible] Sworn Clerks, [illegible] Benjamin Hutton, Esq., [illegible] Lowndes Esq., of Chesham House, Somerset, £50,000. George Harrington, Esq., of Nymans, £80,000. Charles Kelsall, Esq., of Hyde, £60,000. James Oldham Oldham, Esq., of Belmount Hall, £40,000. Theophilus Russell Buckworth, Esq., of Norfolk, £35,000.

MR. FREDERICK SCOTT ARCHER, to whom the world is indebted for the perfection of photography, by his discovery of the collodion process, we regret to state, died on Saturday last at the early age of forty-five. His premature decease will be deeply regretted by all who are interested in the process of photography. It was while very young evinced great taste for fine art, having had the study of sculpture for his profession. Busts were in early request, and he received many commissions; but the delicate state of his health compelled him to abandon this profession, and to next turned his attention to the improvements of photography. After numerous experiments, he discovered the mode of rendering collodion sensitive and obedient to the photographic process, by means of which the most interesting objects in nature as well as art are now portrayed, not only with unerring correctness, but are also transfixed with the rapidity of lightning. Mr. Archer has left a wife and family to deplore the loss of a most affectionate parent and protector. He has died poor, for he threw his discovery open to the world, declining to patent an invention that would doubtless otherwise have placed him and his family in circumstances widely different to those in which they now find themselves.

PROFESSORSHIP OF POLITICAL ECONOMY, OXFORD.—The election of a Professor of Political Economy, in the room of Mr. George Kettilby Rickards, M.A., barrister-at-law, and late Fellow of Queen's College, whose term of office had expired, took place at three o'clock, in the Convocation House; the polling going on at the same time as that for the Poetry Professorship. The contest was between Mr. Charles Neate, M.A., Senior Fellow of Oriel College, the newly-elected M.P. for the city of Oxford; the Rev. J. E. T. Rogers, M.A. of Magdalen Hall; and Mr. Nassau William Senior, M.A. late Fellow of Magdalen College; the latter of whom has twice held the office viz., at its establishment in 1825 and in 1847. The three candidates were all first-class men. The respective numbers at the close of the poll were as follows:—Neate, 194; Rogers, 130; Senior, 124—majority in favour of Neate, 64. The Professorship is tenable for five years; no person to be re-elected until after the expiration of two years.

THE NEW READING-ROOM AND LIBRARIES OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM

THE insufficiency of book-room and accommodation for readers in our great national museum of literature, science, and art, was for many years a public grievance, which it alike baffled the ingenuity of individuals and the "collective wisdom" of Parliament to provide a remedy. The Ministers of the day were successively puzzled with questions as to their intentions, and found little difficulty in evading the queries, now numbering upwards of half a million volumes, besides tracts, pamphlets, manuscripts, music, maps, and newspapers, to an almost incredible number. In the mean time the Museum was rebuilt in a style of stately grandeur, the work occupying nearly half a century; but the last fragment of Montague House was cleared away without the daily increasing demands for the library extension being supplied. The library presented to the nation by George IV., it is true, was magnificently housed; but the extension of the general library remained unprovided for. Various plans were suggested; the most satisfactory of which, proposed by Mr. Panizzi, had to be abandoned on the ground of expense and delay. He then proposed to the Trustees that a building should be erected in the inner quadrangle of the Museum. By this scheme the cost of purchase would be avoided. This proposal was accompanied by drawings, showing the ground plan, and a detail of the manner in which it was proposed that the interior arrangements for the accommodation of the readers and of books should be framed. The architect of the Trustees, Mr. Sydney Smirke, conferred with Mr. Panizzi on the details of this plan, and reported favourably upon it. In July, 1854, Parliament voted the sum of £61,000 "for the erection of a building within the interior quadrangle, for the purpose of affording increased accommodation." The first standard of the building was fixed in January, 1855, and in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for April 14, 1855, appeared an Engraving of the progress of the work to that period. The framework and scaffolding upon which the dome rested were removed on the 2nd of June following; and the entire dome was roofed in, and copper covering laid, in September, 1855.

The Reading-room contains ample and comfortable accommodation for 300 readers. Each person will have a separate table 4ft. 3in. long. He is screened from the opposite occupant by a longitudinal division, which is fitted with a hinged desk graduated on sloping racks, and a folding shelf for spare books

The framework of each table is of iron, forming air-distributing channels, which are contrived so that the air may be delivered at the top of the longitudinal screen division, above the level of the heads of the readers, or, if desired, only at each end pedestal of the tables, all the outlets being under the control of valves. A tubular footrail also passes from end to end of each table, which may have a current of warm water passed through at pleasure, and be used as a foot-warmer.

The catalogue-tables, with shelves under, and air-distributing tubes between, are ranged in two concentric circles around the central superintendent's inclosure or rostrum, the latter being fitted with tables, ticket-boxes, with dwarf partitions surmounted by glass screens, dividing a passage leading to the surrounding libraries. The pedestals of the tables form tubes communicating with the air-chamber below, which is six feet high, and occupies the whole area of the Reading-room. It is fitted with hot-water pipes, arranged in radiating lines. The supply of fresh air is obtained from a shaft sixty feet high, built on the north side of the north wing about 200 feet distant, communicating with a tunnel or subway, which has branches or "loop lines" fitted with valves for diverting the current either wholly through the heating apparatus, or through the cold-air flues, or partly through either, as occasion may require.

The new libraries are in arrangement equally remarkable and original as the other parts of this immense and ingenious structure. It is intended that they shall consist of seven galleries within the dome-room will contain 80,000 volumes. Two lifts are placed at convenient stations, for the purpose of raising the books to the level of the several gallery floors. The building contains three miles lineal of bookcases, and which in all the cases are eight feet high; assuming them all to be spaced for the averaged octavo book size, the entire ranges form twenty-five of shelves; assuming the shelves to be filled with books, of paper of average thickness, the leaves placed edge to edge would extend about 20,000 miles, or more than three times the diameter of the globe. The cost, about £150,000, includes the fittings and furniture.

The decoration of the interior dome is tasteful. The inner surface of the dome is divided into twenty compartments by moulded ribs, which are gilded, the soffites being in ornamental patterns, and the edges touching the adjoining margin fringed with a leaf-pattern sculptured edge. Each compartment contains a circular-headed window, 27 feet high and 12 feet wide, with three panels above, the centre one being medallion-shaped, the whole bordered with gilt mouldings and lines, and the field of the panels finished in encaustic azure blue, the surrounding margin being of a warm cream-colour. The details of the window are treated in like manner—the spandril panels blue; the enriched column and pilaster caps, the central flowers, the border moulding and lines being gilded, the margins cream-colour throughout upon the tops of the main ribs are the usual form of the lantern-light, which is gilded and overcoated to correspond, as 40 feet diameter. The sash is formed of gilt moulded ribs of a ruy-like pattern, emanating from a central medallion, in which the Royal monogram is interlaced with the Imperial crown.

The under cornice, from which the dome springs, is suitably massive and almost wholly gilded, the fringe being formed into panels bounded by lines, terminating at the ends with a gilt fret ornament. Each compartment of the cornice is marked by a bold enriched gilt console, which forms at once the support of the main rib and a base for statuary. The feet of these ribs is designed for colossal marble statues.

Between the cornice and the floor the space is filled with the bookcases and galleries of access, the cornice, standards, and railings of which are wholly gilded, the panels of the soffites of the latter being blue, having gilded ornaments therein. The doors are covered with Kamptulicon.

rounding libraries, 750,000. The building is constructed principally of iron, with brick arches between the main ribs, supported by 20 iron piers, having a sectional area of 10 superficial feet to each, including the brick casing, or 200 feet in all. This saving of space by the use of iron is remarkable, the piers of support on which our dome rests only thus occupying 200 feet; whereas the piers of the Pantheon of Rome fill 7477 feet of area, and those of the Tomb of Mahomet 5593. Upwards of 2000 tons of iron have been used in the construction. The weight of the materials used in the dome is about 4200 tons—viz., upwards of 200 tons on each pier. The roof is formed into two separate spherical and concentric air-chambers, extending over the whole surface; one between the external covering and brick vaulting, the object being the equalisation of temperature during extremes of heat and cold out of doors; the other chamber, between the brick vaulting and the internal visible surface, being intended to carry off the vitiated air from the reading-room. This ventilation is effected through apertures in the sashes of the windows, and partly by others at the top of the dome; the bad air passing through outlets provided around the lantern. In order to obviate the effects of condensation, all the skylights, lanterns, and windows throughout the building are double. The quantity of glass used amounts to about 60,000 superficial feet.

The main entrance into the new Reading-room is direct from the Great Hall, and there are secondary entrances via the King's Library and the Great Northern Library rooms.

To Mr Panizzi is due the merit of the first conception of a single and sufficient structure. His indefatigable industry and unwearying interest in the Museum have been devoted to the daily inspection of the works, and he has originated constant and valuable suggestions in the course of their progress.

The architect, Mr Sydney Smirke, has his merit in the preparation of the original and first designs. The contractors, Messrs. Baker and Fielder, share no common deserts in their professional labours. Indeed, the skill, perseverance, and ingenious resources of their managing partner, Mr. Fielder, have been beyond all praise. All worked together, we understand, without vanity or jealousy, to complete a public reading-room worthy the Museum and their country.

THE MANCHESTER ART-TREASURES [illegible] HALL.

THE ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION AT MANCHESTER.

MANCHESTER, MAY 5.

"I DECLARE this Exhibition to be opened" were the words which, just uttered by Prince Albert, have given to Manchester—the first city in the empire in regard to its manufactures and commerce, and the second in respect to population—an exhibition of its own. Manchester is now placed on a footing of equality with London, with Cork, Dublin, New York, Paris, and other cities where industrial and art gatherings have been held: and the new-made city hurls back upon her detractors the charge that she is too deeply absorbed in the pursuit of material wealth to devote her energies to the finer arts. True it is that the staple industries of the city have but little kindred with the beautiful in art, and that labour, in its sternest, least inviting, and monotonous form, is the lot of Manchester; but the labour which stunts the growth, shortens the years, and hastens the decrepitude of age among the teeming population of the busy, gloomy Ancoats, is the source of that vast wealth which gives to the city its proud pre-eminence; and so sure as this industry and labour produce wealth, so does the accumulated capital seek employment in the encouragement of arts that elevate and refine the mind. The evidences of this appreciation of art are to be seen in various directions—in the almost palatial buildings which adorn the streets of the city, which are made the storerooms for materials which feed the commerce of nearly one-fourth of the civilised world; in the works of art which are to be met with in the elegant villas and splendid mansions of the opulent manufacturers; in the exertions which have been and are still made to promote education among all classes; and in that Art-Treasures Exhibition which to-day commenced its public career.

The opening of this unique and valuable Exhibition of Art-Treasures created, as may well be supposed, an intense excitement in Manchester, and the busy manufacturing towns which swarm around this great centre of wealth and commerce. Most of the huge mills and factories ceased for a portion of the day the whirl of their countless spindles; the tireless steam-engine rested for awhile; and from every squalid cellar and dingy street there came forth the hands and tens of thousands of men, women, and children, to swell the crowds that thronged the streets and join their voices to the shouts of greeting which welcomed the arrival of Prince Albert on his interesting mission. Villagers raised their rustic arches to welcome Prince Albert to the Art-Treasures," and with rough hands and untutored skill decorated their ivy-clad structures with pictures and symbols of those arts of painting and sculpture which even win a ready homage from the rudest minds. Everywhere "art" reigned supreme—art was busy with the huge omnibuses, for the trappings of the horses were newly decorated, and their conductors rejoiced in scarlet liveries; art was seen to have been engaged in the preparation of flags and banners, which waved in endless profusion from the houses; art announcements were on every wall and vacant space.

ARRIVAL OF PRINCE ALBERT AT ABNEY HALL.

The time fixed for the arrival of Prince Albert at the Exhibition building was two o'clock. His Royal Highness, having proceeded in the first instance from the Cheadle station of the London and North-Western Railway to Abney Hall, the seat of James Watts, Esq., the Mayor of Manchester, the Prince was accompanied to the Hall by the Mayor and the High Sheriff, and was received, on his arrival, by Mrs. Watts and her talented and accomplished daughter. The residence of the Mayor is charmingly situated in the pleasant road leading from Manchester to Cheadle, and affording a picturesque vale of meadow and arable land, through which the Mersey winds its tortuous way towards the crowded quays and busy wharves of Liverpool—marking, as it goes, the boundary between the counties of Lancaster and Chester.

DEPARTURE FOR THE EXHIBITION.

His Royal Highness, after partaking of a luncheon, left the Hall at one o'clock, and, accompanied by his suite—consisting of the Marquis of Abercorn, Lord Torrington, General Grey, General Ponsonby, and Colonel Seymour—proceeded in two of the State carriages, which had arrived the previous evening from London, to Old Trafford, with the Mayor and the Sheriffs preceded the Royal carriages in their private equipages, and an escort, formed of a troop of the 7th Dragoon Guards, followed the cortége. The pleasant road leading to Manchester, a distance of about six miles, was lined on both sides by groups of villagers, and made gay by the numerous flags and banners which in some parts were dispersed by the humbler class of cottagers, or in others by the churches. Triumphal arches—rustic in their style, and humble in their decoration—were placed along the road at distances of about a mile apart. On the confines of Cheadle an arch bore the inscription, "Welcome to Cheadle;" at Dudlows was another, with the words "Welcome, Prince Albert, to the Art-Treasures," at the little village of Witherington stood another simil r erection, with "Welcome, Prince Albert," and at Fallonfield a fourth arch bore the same inscription. On each of the arches were the initials of the Queen and Prince Albert, on some the words "God Save the Queen" and on all an humble attempt at artistic decoration, sometimes in the shape of a crown, or the Royal arms, or figures intended, I presume, to represent some personage associated in the minds of the villagers with either power wisdom, or evil acts. As the cortége with its bright liveries of the Royal servants, the scarlet uniform and glittering helmets of the escort, proceeded rapidly along the winding road "o'er the dun line of red appearing over the tops of the green hedges, or running with the light young foliage of the trees the flutter of flags of various colours, the motley columns of the roadside spectators; the groups of spectators in the small gardens; the country carts and vehicles of all kinds filled with country people, which followed as rapidly as their heavily-laden condition and jaded horses would permit, reminding one of a rural "Derby Day" on a small scale; and the hearty cheers of the people, produced a scene as interesting, from its hearty and picturesque character, as the more imposing one it immediately succeeded, and which continued until the Prince arrived at the building.

ARRIVAL AT THE CITY BOUNDARY—OXFORD-ROAD.

The cortége, small in extent, and consisting of only four carriages on leaving Abney Hall, was increased on crossing the Mersey by the presence of the Earl of Burlington, the Lord Lieutenant, and the High Sheriff of the county of Lancaster. At the city boundary a further accession was made. Arriving at the Oxford-road, the cortége was met by the Aldermen of Manchester in their private carriages, the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs of London in their gorgeous state carriages and bright-coloured liveries, and by the Lord Mayor of Dublin, the Mayor of Salford, and others. The procession was formed at this point in the following order:—

Troop of the 7th Dragoon Guards.
Alderman Neild in his carriage, with Dr. Lyon Playfair, C.B.
Alderman Watkins in his carriage.
All [illegible] carriages
Alderman Nicholl in his carriage.
The Lord Mayor of Dublin in his state carriage.
The Lord Mayor of London in his state carriage, with Mr. Alderman Cubitt, M.P., and Mr Sheriff Mechi in his state carriage, with Sheriff Mr Alexander Ceriley
The Lord Bishop of Manchester [illegible] accompanied by Stowell and the Rev. C. H [illegible] with his chaplains, the Rev Canon
[illegible]
The High Sheriff of [illegible]
Earl of Burlington,
Lord Lieutenant of the county of Lancaster,
Gen. C. Grey, Colonel Seymour, and Equerries [illegible] the Mayor of Manchester, and [illegible]

General Sir Harry Smith, Colonel Griffin, Colonel Wilbraham, Adjutant General, Captain Payne, A.D.C., and Major Bond, also joined the procession on horseback. Here the crowd of spectators began to increase, and to assume somewhat of that dingy aspect which must be expected from a gathering of factory workers—relieved, however, at many points by the elegant dresses of the fair spectators who crowded the windows and balconies of the houses overlooking the procession. The state carriages of the Lord Mayors of London and Dublin were noticed in many places for those containing the Lord Mayors and their Lordships received an amount of enthusiastic cheering upon which they had probably not calculated. Along the Stretford-road the crowds of spectators were immense, and every available position was occupied by them.

THE ART-TREASURES BUILDING.

At eleven o'clock the doors of the Exhibition Building were opened for the admission of visitors, and then commenced the rushing in of the impatient expectant tide of anxious season-ticket holders. There was, as there always will be in such cases, some slight confusion, for Englishmen deem it a duty to be first in a crowd; and ladies on such occasions appear to be perfectly aware that their dresses, though expansive, may sometimes require a very much smaller space. At length, when the barriers were passed, and the building in its fine proportions and delicate colours, the marble forms of sculpture of transparent whiteness, relieved by the dark backgrounds of maroon-coloured walls or the crimson-carpeted floor, the glittering treasures which filled the numerous spaces arranged along the nave, and the rich and sombre colouring of the old portraits that carried the mind back to earlier historic periods, burst upon the view, could not restrain an exclamation that the Art Treasures Exhibition was a great success. Gradually the building began to fill, forms of witching beauty and female loveliness moved gracefully amid the treasures of art. A short time previous to the opening the ranges of seats rising one above the other behind the dais began to fill with the female members of the chorus and the more sombre complexions and dark coats of the bass and tenor vocalists, who had assembled for a final rehearsal of the magnificent chorus in which they were to take part. Amid the silence which prevailed the organ suddenly burst forth, and the choir, with a hearty good will, well-trained throats, and Lancashire lungs, sang the National Anthem, "The heavens are telling," the Old Hundredth, and the sublime Hallelujah Chorus. The effect of this rehearsal in the comparatively untenanted building was magnificent. The strength of voice was enormous. It came pealing, sweeping in every direction right and left, above and below, till at length every available seat, in gallery and transept, was occupied. The front seats were occupied, with here and there a solitary exception, by ladies, whose rich toilets formed a parterre of colours of every tint and hue, and displayed every form in which fancy or fashion or refined taste could shape the gossamer thread of the worm, and the exquisitely-finished or embroidered product of the loom or the needle. Then came members of the military profession in scarlet costume, officers of the Exhibition in the blue and gold Court dresses, unchanged by time or fashion from the style in vogue when many of these historical portraits on the walls were painted, and the newer Orientals in their Eastern costume, torn from Babylon the splendid of whose names I will not attempt, and representatives from the Western Hemisphere—Mr. Dallas, of the Court of St. James, and Baron Danner, the sable representative of the empire of Hayti, separated from each other by the mere colour of their skins by a gulf broader and deeper than the seas which roll between the small island-empire of Soulouque and the colossal States of the American Union; and he with the white and flowing locks stepped aside from the the woolly-haired descendant of Ham, and placed the Minister of Belgium—a country of the Old World—between "the wind and his nobility."

At length a confused murmur passes through the building, the sound of trumpets is heard, all eyes are directed towards the entrance, for the Prince has arrived. There were there to receive his Royal Highness a goodly array of men famous in commerce, in science, in art, and in literature, and eminent in their private and official character. There were the Earl of Carlisle, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Overstone, with his suite, the Duke of Argyll; Earl Granville, Lord Stanley of Alderley, Sir Benjamin Hall President of the Board of Works, Lord Overstone, President of the General Council of the Exhibition; the members of the Executive Committee, Messrs. Watts, Esq., Chairman (ex officio), Messrs. T. Fairbairn, Chairman, Thomas Ashton, William Entwisle, Joseph Heron, Jd. Potter, and S. J. Stern, the Duke of Newcastle, the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Marquis of Stafford, the Marquis of Chandos, Earl Fortescue, Earl of Yarborough, the Earl of Burlington, the Earl of Lincoln, Lord Ward, Lord Belhaven, Lord Ebrington, Lord Cavendish, M.P., Lord Broughton, Lord Belper, the Bishop of Manchester, accompanied by the Rev. Canon Stowell, and the Rev. G. H. G. Anson, his Lordship's chaplains; Lieutenant-General Sir Charles Smith, Bart., C.B., General in Command of the Northern and Midland Districts, Sir James Montgomery, Sir Benjamin Heywood, Sir Humphrey De Trafford; Aldermen Cubitt, Potter, M.P.; James Aspinall Turner, Esq., M.P.; Herbert Ingram, Esq., M.P.; W. N. Massey, Esq., M.P.; John Cheetham, Esq., M.P.; R. N. Philips, Esq., M.P.; James Kershaw, Esq., M.P.; Charles Hindley, Esq., M.P.; J. P. Browne Westhead, Esq., M.P.; E. W. Watkin, Esq., M.P.; J. P. Hope, Esq., M.P.; S. Heelis, Esq., Mayor of Salford; C. Towneley, Esq., High Sheriff of Lancashire; Wm. Atkinson, Esq., High Sheriff of Cheshire; Ald Finnis, Lord Mayor of London;—Atkinson, Esq., Lord Provost of Glasgow; Aldermen Salmons, Copeland, Cubitt, and Keats, and Mr. Sheriff Mechi, of London; Mrs. Ross Mangles, Chairman, Sir F. Currie Deputy Chairman, and Colonel Sykes ex-Chairman, of the East India Company, Rear-Admiral Maxsom, C.B.; the Hon. Captain Carnegie, C.B., R.N., Professor Owen, and Professor Simpson, Sir Charles Eastlake, President of the Royal Academy; Sir C. Lewis, President of the Society of Water-Colour Painters, Mr. Warren, President of the New Water-Colour Society; Messrs. T. Bazley, T. Tootal, and W. R. Callender, Deputy Lieutenants of the County; Messrs. W. Fairbairn, C.E., F.R.S., J. Whitworth, C.E., C. Barber, John Pender, and many other subscribers to the Guarantee Fund, and Colonel Hodge, 4th Dragoon Guards, wearing proudly the honours and decorations which he had won in the Crimea.

The bands outside the building gave forth the National Anthem and a field-battery fired a salute on the occasion. There is an on-dit respecting the said battery which curiously illustrates the power of very decided opinions on the Peace question. It was arranged that the salute should be fired in a field, at a short distance from the building, but the owner of the property was opposed to all military establishments, and he courageously barred the entrance against the six guns, and Capt. Frankland, who had not feared Russian artillery at Inkerman, retreated with his guns from that solitary member of the Peace Society.

Prince Albert entered the reception-room, which had been very tastefully decorated by Messrs. Jackson and Graham, and a description of which I forwarded last week, and, after remaining a few minutes, was conducted to a dais canopied with green silk, around which were assembled in their robes of office Aldermen Sir Elkanah Armitage, Bancroft, Barnes, Bowker, Heywood, Mackie, Neild, Nicholls, Sir John Potter, M.P. (in a Court dress), Shuttleworth, Watkins, and Willert; Councillors Williams, Gibson, Parnell, Joseph Lamb, Howard, Walker, Pratt, M'Gill, Worthington, Dyson, Newton, Hetherington, Curtis, Ellis, Mountcastle, King, Sharp, Goadsby, W. H. Lamb, Grave, Robinson, Fletcher, Ryder, M'Connell, Clark, Haworth, Crewdson, Cottrell, Rumney, Jones, Bennett, Bake, Neill, and some other members of the Corporation. The Town Clerk then advanced, and read an address from the Corporation.

The Mayor handed to his Royal Highness the beautifully-written, emblazoned, and mounted address; and his Royal Highness handing it to General Grey, received from him a copy of the following reply, which his Royal Highness read, in a clear and audible manner:—

"Mr. Mayor, Aldermen, and Councillors—I have received with feelings of no ordinary gratification the address which you have presented to me, expressing such kindly feelings towards myself, and professing to represent the good wishes of the vast community which is collected in and around this city.

It will, I assure, be most pleasing to the Queen to receive, from the expressions contained in the address, a fresh assurance of the loyal interest taken by her people in all that concerns her happiness.

I most willingly attend here this day to assist at a ceremony which the inhabitants of Manchester may well witness with pride as its object is to [illegible] Exhibition conducted by the exertion of their enterprise and [illegible] and intended not for the amusement and gratification of the neighbourhood alone, but for the instruction and improvement of the nation at large.

You justly allude, in terms of gratitude, to that comprehensive and liberal spirit which has adorned the walls of this building with the choicest specimens of art from so many private galleries of the kingdom. It adds much to the pleasure with which I open the Queen and myself had [illegible] the application of works of art belonging to us, when we [illegible] are, in general, so readily intrusted by their owners to the care of others.

The Queen will, I am confident, be glad again to visit Manchester, not only to mark by her presence her approval of the object and successful execution of this great undertaking, which no large city but from a union of the public spirit and liberality exhibited when she had formerly an opportunity of visiting the great centre of industry [illegible]

The Prince then, accompanied by his suite and a number of the more distinguished visitors, proceeded to the dais in the Transept of the building, the band, under M. Hallé, meanwhile performing the National Anthem. The dais and the extreme end of the building to which the Prince was proceeding presented an imposing appearance. The gorgeous banners of the Queen and Prince Albert streaming down the tall masts on each side of the platform, the gallery fronts enlivened by the banners of various countries most noted in the history of art, and the banner and arms of Manchester crossing over the top of the organ with its elaborately-draped front of gold and silver pipes: the British flags at the ends of the Transepts, the well-filled orchestra and the crowded galleries combined to form a scene calculated to awaken pleasing emotions and to give strength and force to those expressions of loyalty and [illegible] from every part of the building. Arrived on the dais, Lord Overstone read an address to his Royal Highness, of which the following is a copy:—

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE ALBERT, K.G.

May it please your Royal Highness,—In the name of the General Council of the Executive Committee, and of the officers connected with the preparatory arrangements of this great undertaking, I approach your Royal Highness with the expression of our deep sense of obligation for the constant interest which your Royal Highness has taken in the success of the Exhibition now about to be opened for the gratification and instruction of the public.

Let me, however, on this occasion, be allowed to add, that we also approach your Royal Highness with feelings which cannot but bring sorrow to her Majesty's subjects, to your Royal Highness, and to the members of the Royal family, and which have long admired the virtues and respected the character of her late Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester.

In the presence of your Royal Highness amongst us under these painful circumstances and the [illegible] Royal Highness not to suspend the consideration of the [illegible] would be to refuse a delicate consideration to which [illegible] would be to disappoint [illegible] which it would [illegible] Highness to desire to [illegible] in all other respects, in the strictest privacy.

On [illegible] behalf of the General Council.

His Royal Highness replied as follows:—

My Lord and Gentlemen—You are very kind in thinking at this moment of the bereavement which has befallen the Queen and her family.

In the Duchess of Gloucester we have all lost, not only the last of the [illegible] of good [illegible] who occupied the throne during sixty years, and carried her [illegible] unimpaired [illegible] through [illegible] to most [illegible] but we have also lost a [illegible] which it would [illegible] and thus the last personal link with [illegible] the respect and [illegible] virtues and qualities of the heart had [illegible] her.

If I have thought it my duty to attend here to-day, although her mortal [illegible] has been [illegible] to their last place of rest, my decision [illegible] by the [illegible] that [illegible] could her own opinions and wishes have been known [illegible] would, with that sense of duty and [illegible] which she belonged, have been [illegible] I should not on her account, or from private feelings, disturb an arrangement intended for the public good.

Mr. Thomas Fairbairn next read the address of the Executive Committee, which detailed the origin and progress of the Exhibition; to which his Royal Highness made the following reply:—

Gentlemen of the Executive Committee,—I thank you most sincerely for your kind address.

I have [illegible] expressions of loyalty and attachment to the Queen which it conveys will, I am certain, be most gratifying to her.

I have with pleasure accepted your invitation to preside at the inauguration of this undertaking which I have watched with the deepest interest from its first conception to the present moment.

I may now be allowed to congratulate you on the success which has attended your efforts.

The [illegible] which we assembled and the wonderful collection of [illegible] treasures of art, and [illegible] which it displays, reflect the highest credit upon you. [illegible] which the [illegible] with [illegible] and the [illegible] of enterprise of the [illegible] in the [illegible] of mutual confidence and a good understanding [illegible] which it affords so [illegible]

We have a fact which the rich, and those who have, set before those to whom fortune has denied the higher luxuries of life, bringing forth [illegible] treasures and intrusting them to your care, in order to [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of their private enjoyments to their choicest and [illegible] at large, and [illegible] to your care, in order to [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] and chronological [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the which an army of waiters would not suffice to supply from the inexhaustible commissariat stores laid in by Mr. Donald.

We take this opportunity of stating, in correction of a former account, that the site of the Exhibition Building being chosen by the Executive Committee, after mature deliberation, the plans sent in by Messrs. C. D. Young and Co., of London and Edinburgh, were accepted, with some modification, for the spacious edifice of iron, wood, and glass (with a facade of red and yellow brick)—the design being that of Mr. William Dredge, C.E., engineer to Messrs. Young and Co., contractors for its erection, and the façade being designed by Mr. E Salomons, architect to the Committee

The success of the Art-Treasures Exhibition may be regarded as beyond all doubt, judging from the number of persons who visited the building on Wednesday. The admissions on payment amounted to 1095, and the admissions by season tickets were 6000.

PRINCE ALBERT'S VISIT TO SALFORD. INAUGURATION OF THE QUEEN'S STATUE.

MANCHESTER, May 6.

TO-DAY busy, dingy, toiling Manchester has again sent forth the tens of thousands of its population on the occasion of a public ceremonial—more modest, it is true, in its character than the great event of yesterday, but scarcely second to it in its interesting and peaceful character. The inauguration of a Statue of her Majesty by her illustrious consort could hardly fail to be an attractive ceremony at any time; but the circumstances connected with the erection of the present statue, and the object it is designed to celebrate, gave additional interest to the proceedings. The statue of her Majesty is one erected almost exclusively by the pence and the small voluntary offerings of the Sunday-school teachers and scholars of Manchester, and it commemorates the visit of her Majesty in 1851, when not less than 80,000 of these scholars were assembled in Peel Park and joined the youthful voices in one vast chorus—such as the world had never before heard—in singing the National Anthem. The statue is erected in Peel Park, and close by it stands the spacious Library and Museum, and the Exhibition of Local Art, which Prince Albert visited at the same time. Here, then, were parks for the recreation, schools and museums for the instruction, and pictures and sculpture for the elevation and refinement of the tastes of the toiling population of the great city. The Sunday-schools—with which the statue is so closely connected—form one of the most interesting features of the social condition of Manchester. Confined by day to the dull monotony of factory life, immured by night in squalid courts and lanes, thousands of the factory-workers live only to tend the mules or the spinning-jenny or watch the ceaseless shuttles of the steam-driven looms. Little time have they for education, and the small earnings of the children cannot be sacrificed to provide the time necessary for instruction. Sunday is the only day of rest for the factory; and when the steam-engine ceases its labour the children may go to school. Hundreds of thousand who, but for the Sunday-school system would remain in the most complete ignorances, receive the rudiments of an education which fits them for the discharge of the advancing duties of life. Mayors and Aldermen and Common Councilmen—ay, and members of Parliament for these manufacturing districts—have owed to those Sunday-schools their earliest lessons in education. There is no organised union among the different schools; each religious body conducts its schools in its own way; but on the 10th of October, 1851, all minor differences were sunk, and the result was the extraordinary meeting of the 80,000 scholars to which I have referred. At the present time the number of scholars is about the same as in 1851; and they may be distributed in something like the following proportion:—Church of England, 25,000; Independents, 10,000; Wesleyans, 13,000; Wesleyan Association, 3800; Primitive Methodists, 2800; Baptists, 2500; New Connexion Methodists, 1100; Presbyterians, 1400; Unitarians, 600; Roman Catholics, 7500; various, 3000. The schools are supported entirely by voluntary contributions, and small fees paid by some of the scholars. The teachers give their services gratuitously, and the elementary education afforded is generally given in the buildings attached to the chapels or places of public worship. A majority of cases small libraries are attached to those schools, and additional week-day evening instruction is provided by some of the religious societies. Shortly after the visit of her Majesty a Memorial Committee was appointed: it recommended the erection at once of some monument as a lasting memorial of the event; suggesting at the same time that "whatever be the character of the monument it should be one in the erection of which the schools may themselves participate, as a means of impressing upon their recollection an event which, to the majority, will form one of the most important in their lives." The suggestion was adopted, and a commission was given to Mr. Noble to execute for the sum of 1000 guineas, a statue of her Majesty in marble. This it was that was to-day inaugurated by Prince Albert.

His Royal Highness left Abney Hall at nine o'clock this morning, and was met by the Mayor of Salford and the Town Clerk, at Albert-bridge, over the black and sewer-like Irwell, which forms the municipal boundary of the borough of Salford and city of Manchester. A deputation from the Borough Council, consisting of Aldermen Longworth, Kay, Higgins, Agnew, and Weston, also accompanied the cortège to the entrance of the Park. Chapel-street, leading up to the Park, was thronged with spectators, and the Prince had once more an opportunity of witnessing a real Manchester crowd. The assembling together were thousands of the fustian-clad, sallow-looking men, remarkable for a low average in stature; and women and girls, stunted and pale, dressed in dingy-coloured gowns, wearing no bonnets, and the head covered with shawls dark in colour, some from dirt and some from dye, attended by countless shoals of children of the most tender age. The immense majority of women and children in these public gatherings is one of the curious features of the place. Can it be that, among the wonderful mechanical appliances of this wonderful city, there are any which send out in a finished state these crowds of juvenile consumers of calico?

Upon his arrival at the Park his Royal Highness was conducted to the Library, where were also assembled some members of the Borough Council. This library was one of the first established under Mr. Ewart's Free Libraries Act, and was opened to the public gratuitously on the 7th of January, 1850. It has been since considerably enlarged, and at present contains about 20,000 volumes. A new wing has recently been added, which was opened to the public with an exhibition of works of local art about a fortnight since, and which is now in full view. Peel Park is one of three which Manchester now possesses. It consists of thirty-two acres, which were purchased by the Corporation for £10,000 from Mr. Garnett, the Sheriff of the county. It is pleasantly situated, and is about a mile from the Exchange in Manchester, and the Irwell forms its eastern boundary. The late Sir Robert Peel contributed £1000 towards the funds for the purchase of the Park. It now bears his name. A tastefully-fitted dais was erected in the library, and his Royal Highness having been conducted to it, T. Heelis, Esq., the Mayor of Salford, read a congratulatory address from the Corporation.

Prince Albert delivered the following reply to the address:—

Mr. Mayor, Aldermen, and Gentlemen,

I thank you, with all my heart, for the address you have presented, and for your warm expressions of attachment to the Queen. It must be very pleasing to her to find her subjects uniting with her, in joy and satisfaction, on any event which tends to increase her happiness and that of her family; and, on the other hand, sympathising with her in her sorrow when the inscrutable decrees of Providence have visited them with affliction. My presence here to-day may testify to you, in return, that any object which may be designed for the improvement of the prosperity and happiness of her people command her personal interest and solicitude thereon. I may be allowed to congratulate you upon the achievement of a work of such usefulness to this vast community as the completion of this part of the Library and museum, giving at once the means of healthful recreation and mental improvement to a population employed day after day without a relief in the monotonous labour of factory work. I congratulate you, however, particularly upon your success proving to your fellow-citizens that these means of information and improvement are worthy of their individual exertions, and in the fact that they themselves made the exertions which were necessary to secure the blessing of them, which they will doubly value as their own. The satisfaction to which you have referred, showing the number of persons who have availed themselves of the boon, amply testify that this is the case; and that any attempt to graft upon the Art-Treasures Exhibition, now attracting the attention of Europe to Manchester, a permanent institution, would be in accordance with the spirit of the people, and would probably succeed in furthering the objects, the benefit of which for their welfare they have learned to appreciate. It is with pleasure that I comply with your request to inaugurate the statue which you have erected in the spot where the Queen met for the first time your busy, in the presence of some children enjoying the blessings established by her, that they may grow up an ornament to the country and strength of their country—may always wish, and may succeeding generations seeing the Queen's statue in the midst of the park, find in its contemplation an assurance that, where loyalty and affection to the sovereign as the representative of the institutions of the country are linked to an ardent love of progress, founded upon self-culture and self-improvement, a country cannot fail to prosper under the favour of Divine Providence.

The Bishop of Manchester then came forward and presented an address from the Institutional Association of Lancashire and Cheshire.

An address was also presented by the committee of artists who have contributed to the Local Art Exhibition. Accompanied by the Mayor, Mr. Hammerton, and others, Prince Albert then proceeded through the museum and the collection of pictures.

While thus engaged in the interior of the building, an immense crowd was anxiously awaiting the appearance of his Royal Highness in that portion of the Park where the statue of her Majesty was, awaiting for the ceremony of the unveiling. Spacious platforms and ample accommodation were provided for the spectators, who were admitted by tickets; and a pavilion, neatly decorated with pink and blue drapery, was set up for the reception of the Prince and his suite. At length his Royal Highness, having completed his tour of inspection, proceeded to the pavilion, where Alderman Agnew, the chairman of the Sunday-school Memorial Committee, read an address to the Prince.

Mr. Agnew then handed to the Mayor a deed assigning the statue to the Mayor, Aldermen, and burgesses of the borough. On receiving this deed the Mayor, addressing the Prince, said:—

The statue which is before us, and which I have now the pleasure to ask your Royal Highness to inaugurate, was erected to commemorate the visit of her Majesty to this place in October, 1851, and her reception on that occasion by a concourse of Sunday-school teachers and scholars to the number of at least 80,000. Many of these are now here present; and I am sure they join with me in fervent prayer and cordial wishes that this may long remain a statue to our Sovereign's honour, living as she does in the hearts of her affectionate subjects; and that she may long continue to reign over a prosperous, united, and loyal people.

The unveiling of the Statue was marked by a Royal salute and the band of the 58th performing the National Anthem. The Prince and his suite, consisting of the Marquis of Abercorn, Viscount Torrington, General Grey, and Colonel Ponsonby, immediately after left the Park in the Royal carriages, and, passing over Blackfriars-bridge and by the Royal Exchange, drove to the London-road station, where an express train was in waiting to convey them to London. In his progress through Manchester Prince Albert received most enthusiastic demonstrations of applause, and, as at every other point, the streets were crowded and the windows of the houses filled with spectators.

The arrangements for the Special Train to Manchester on the London and North-Western Railway were admirable, and elicited the warm approbation of the Prince.

MUSIC.

SINCE Mademoiselle Ortolani's début at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, in the character of Elvira in the "Puritani," she has performed that part a second and a third time, on Saturday and Tuesday last. On both occasions she was very favourably received; and, being less under the influence of timidity than at first, she both acted and sang with increased power. Some of her defects, very perceptible on that memorable her début, seem to have arisen, in part at least, from nervous agitation, for they have subsequently become less apparent. Her voice has lost much of its tremulousness, and she has acquired a firmer portamento; while, though she certainly carries the florid style to excess, her fioriture, varied and graceful in themselves, are executed with an air of ease and spontaneousness which greatly improves their effect. Her acting, too, doubtless from a similar cause, has gained in force and energy, though it still lacks the intensity of passion exhibited in some scenes of this opera demand. There are other pieces, we think, better suited to her powers, and in which she will be more completely successful than in the "Puritani." As to Giuglini's Arturo, we can only repeat that, both as a beautiful ancomended piece of acting, and as a specimen of Italian singing in all its purity and finish, it has not been surpassed—if, indeed, it has ever been equalled—by any performer who has appeared on our stage.

The woes and wrongs of the gentle Lucy Ashton, one of the numerous heroines for whom the Italian stage is indebted to the Scottish wizard, have been strangers to Her Majesty's Theatre for some years. The opera, abounding both in dramatic situation and in melody, is ever welcome, but the great parts in it are both very strong, and it is not easy to fill both in an adequate manner. Mr. Lumley has ever displayed too much respect for the art which he has so long and so admirably upheld, and for the public (which he never seems to have regarded as a mere abstraction) with a full purse, but as an old friend to be treated with one's best), to present a favourite work in an inefficient manner; but, having now at his disposal forces of no ordinary strength, he is enabled to give this very delightful opera with both a Lucia and an Edgardo worthy of the occasion. The pressure upon our space this week compels us to remain satisfied with simply recording the selection of this work for a new display of the talents of Mdlle. Piccolomini and of Signor Giuglini; but next week we hope to have the pleasure of detailing the triumph of both these admirable artistes in two of the most impressive rôles of the lyric drama. The charming Mdle. Pucchini continues to practise her resistless fascinations, as the heroine of Notre Dame. Mr. Lumley's speculation in discovering the stars of ballet is a recognised fact; and it only remains to say that he has seldom been more fortunate than in the present instance. Mdlle. Pocchini is a most fearless and most accomplished dancer, in not in the least afraid to think of difficulties, and is daring in the vanishing them. Had she been a General in the Crimea she would have stormed Sebastopol—as she is a charming artiste in London, she takes the Haymarket by storm; and as, according to Pope, all the honour lies in playing well your part, all honour to little Mademoiselle Pocchini.

The attractions for the forthcoming week are of great interest. Alboni will make her first appearance in the ever fresh "Barbière," on Tuesday; and the "Lucia," with Alboni and Giuglini, is to be repeated on Thursday. The "Trovatore," supported by Alboni, Spezia, Giuglini, and Violetti, is in preparation; and the utmost exertions are being made for the production of "Don Giovanni," in which al the members of the company have promised to lend their aid.

AT the ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA "Lucrezia Borgia" was performed on Saturday last for the first time this season, with Grisi as the heroine. This "Queen of the Lyric Stage" has lost none of her regal attributes. Her Lucrezia was as grand, as terrible, as profoundly affecting as ever. Mario, as usual, would have been the Gennaro, but was disabled by an attack of hoarseness, and his place was supplied by Neri Baraldi. This was a happy chance for the young tenor, for it gave him an unlooked for opportunity of showing his talents; and he did so to the entire satisfaction of a crowded audience. He sang beautifully; and, in the scene of agony and despair between the hapless son and the still more wretched mother, he completely, in stage phrase, "acted up to" Grisi, and divided with her the applause of the house. Ronconi's Duke of Ferrara was a display of dramatic power worthy of comparison with the Othello of Edmund Kean. What a pity that this great actor, whose greatness embraces the whole range of the drama, should be so defective in the vocal part of his performances! But his power of making his audience forget, for the time, the very existence of his vocal defects only shows the immense amount of his genius. Madame Didiée, as the young Orsini, acted and sang charmingly. Excepting only Alboni, this lady is the finest contralto now on the stage.

MR. GYE has resumed the OPERA CONCERTS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, set on foot by him last year, in order to provide the means of supporting his immense establishment, the receipts of the Lyceum Theatre being insufficient for that purpose. The expedient was very successful last season, and promises to be so again. The first concert took place on Friday last week), and, the weather having been favourable, drew a great concourse of visitors to Sydenham. The Central Transept of the building was turned into a vast music-hall, with a great orchestra, and capable of containing an assemblage of from three to four thousand persons. The entertainment was drawn entirely from the resources of the establishment—the principal singers, the orchestra, and the chorus. The music too, was wholly taken from the repertoire of the Royal Italian Opera; nothing being performed but pieces heard nightly in the operas at the Lyceum. To the somewhat blasé frequenters of the Opera such concerts are not very interesting; but to the great bulk of the audience the sweet strains of Grisi, Bosio, Didiée, Mario, and Gardoni, have all the charm of novelty and freshness. There is no doubt, therefore, that (as was the case last year) those concerts, which take place every Friday, will draw crowds to the end of the season.

PART I.

| Sinfonia in D, No. 2 | .. | Mozart. |
| Aria, "O Salutaris hostia," Miss Lascelles | .. | Cherubini. |

PART II.

|---|---|---|
| Sinfonia in C Minor, No. 5 | .. | Beethoven. |

| Lascelles | .. | Rossini. |
| Cavatina, Contrabasso, Signor Bottesini | .. | Weber. |
| Overture (Ruler of the Spirits) | .. | |

Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett.

This, as every musician will at once perceive, was a fine selection, and the performance was worthy of the music. We never heard the great orchestral masterpieces of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Weber, more superbly played, or listened to with warmer demonstrations of pleasure. Great interest was excited by the appearance of M. Remenyi, who played Ernst's concerto. He is a young Hungarian refugee, who has been some time in England, and holds the place of solo violin to the Queen, but he has scarcely ever been heard in public. He showed himself a great artist, equally remarkable for beauty of tone, command of the instrument, elevation of style, and strength of expression. His success was complete; and no one was warmer in expressions of admiration than the composer of the music, Ernst himself. Bottesini's solo on the contrabasso was a truly marvellous performance, and still more beautiful than surprising—a thing which cannot often be said of displays of instrumental execution. The vocal music, excellent in itself, was excellently sung. Madame Enderssohn is well known as one of the best of our native vocalists. Miss Lascelles is a young contralto singer, just rising into notice, who cannot fail to become a favourite of the public. Both were greatly applauded. The room was crowded.

THERE was also a crowded room at the concert of the MUSICAL UNION on Tuesday morning. It was an admirable entertainment, and derived peculiar interest from the presence of the renowned pianiste, Madame Clara Schumann, who has now paid her second visit to this country, where she will be sure to receive the honour she has paid to her last year. She played Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," op. 57, a masterpiece of the illustrious author; and, we need scarcely add, played it divinely, and to the delight of a highly-musical audience. She also played several short pieces of Scarlatti—beautiful things, which show how much the modern composers for the pianoforte owe to this great old master. Two fine quartets of Beethoven and Mendelssohn, in which the first violin was played by Ernst, formed the rest of this concert.

MISS P. HORTON'S ENTERTAINMENT.—Mr. and Mrs. German Reed are giving a new entertainment at the Gallery of Illustration, which promises to be as successful as that which (for the present only, we presume) has been laid aside. It is in two parts—"A Month in the Country" and "My Unfinished Opera." In the first Mr. and Mrs. Reed are represented as spending a month in a quiet country village, where Mr. Reed at the same time gives music-lessons in a lady's boarding-school. This framework admits the introduction of various originals in rural life; particularly the schoolmistress herself—a delightful creation, quaint and amusing, but full of genial kindness of heart, whose régime of love, not of fear, might prove a wholesome lesson to many of her professional brethren. There are some of her pupils, too, especially an inveterate dunce, whose staiteries are excessively ludicrous. There are also several pictures of the village population, all true to nature, and drawn with infinite spirit. The second part is continued from the previous entertainment. Mr. Reed is still engaged in the composition of his opera, and is interrupted, as before, by the intrusive visits of a succession of ridiculous personages. All these various characters are personated by Mrs. Reed, whose versatility of talent is made with a rapidity and success quite startling. Her acting, as usual, is intermixed with a great deal of singing—mostly comic, and sometimes serious and pathetic, but always beautiful.

THE THEATRES, &c.

ADELPHI.—The management of this theatre has revived, and manifests its renewed life by the production and promise of novelties. On Monday a very sprightly farce was presented, under a terrible title—"Fearful Tragedy in the Seven Dials." The adapter has availed himself of a vaudeville by M. Labiche somewhat denominated—"L'Affaire de la Rue de Sourcine"—but the English version is much the merrier, and by far the more effective. The structure of the piece is peculiar and, we might say, philosophical, for in it "all things are made double, one over against the other." This dualism is accomplished through the medium of Mr. Paul Bedford and Mr. Wright, a pair of "social villagers," who have partaken of a festivity at Highbury, and after dinner wandered they cannot recollect where, and done they cannot recollect what. In the morning, however, both find themselves at the house of Mr. Timothy Stumpington (Mr. Wright), whose wife (Miss Arden) returns home from the country before her husband is up, and hears from a cousin a full account of the previous night's revel, and its consequences. She supplies breakfast to her erring spouse and unknown guest, and, in the course of it, reads an account from an old newspaper of a murder in Seven Dials, committed by two men on a woman who kept a coal-shed. A shoe, a cap, some false hair, and some pieces of coal, are found in the possession of the two unfortunate villagers, which they connect with this account of the murder, and, in the utter oblivion of what had really passed, naturally consider themselves the possible homicides. In the confusion their faces get blacked. To remove this evidence of their guilt, they vainly endeavour to wash in the same hand-basin, and resort to other contrivances, which provoke much laughter. At length matters become more serious. They plot to "suppress" the cousin, whose evidence against them might be fatal, by shutting him up in a room with a charcoal fire, and then furtively seek to "suppress" each other—one secretly arming himself with a boot jack and the other with the bellows. With this deadly idea in their minds they are preparing at the breakfast-table, each watching his opportunity. Then commences the grim fun, of which Mr. Wright has the best, Mr. Bedford making a stalwart contrast, depending rather on his size than his grimace. Happy for both it is when they discover that the newspaper from which the report had been read is six years old, and that the utmost amount of their delinquency was a contest with a barmaid, to whom the articles of female apparel belonged, and whom the guardian cousin had recompensed. Whether this "murder in jest" is a legitimate farcical incident is certainly disputable; not so the fact that the audience are excited to uproarious mirth by the curious exhibition of the two performers in a situation so extraordinary and ridiculous. We may add that Miss Arden, as Mrs. Stumpington, acted a part, not unimportant though subordinate, with judgment and effect, and thereby rendered the general action more probable than otherwise it might have appeared.

AN INDIAN FORTUNE.—HEIRS WANTED.—The Greenock Telegraph lately published a paragraph relative to the discovery of a fortune left unclaimed and a half having been left by a deceased Calcutta merchant, to be divided among all his relatives who could be traced out. The same paper now says:—"The parties who believed themselves concerned in the vast fortune, now supposed to be nearly double the sum we have stated, held a meeting in Glasgow last week, and have resolved to use every possible means of realising the golden prize. Upwards of a hundred applicants were present. The name of the nabob was M'Causland. He is said to have been born in the parish of Roseneath, Dumbartonshire not Rothesay, about ninety years ago, and had been absent from his native place for seventy years, although, from certain circumstances his name is still traditionally well known in the place. He has many relatives of the name of Campbell; and, as that is a public clan in the west of Scotland, a considerable number of the name are among the claimants. At the meeting there were representatives of ranged heirs from Greenock, Paisley, Glasgow, Garelochside, Dumbarton, Helensburgh, and various parts of Argyllshire and Stirlingshire; and an eminent London solicitor has been retained by the parties."—Dumbarton Herald.

THE LATE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.

In our Journal of last week we recorded the death of this amiable Duchess; and gave a brief memoir of her Royal Highness.

It is stated in the Court Journal that the last hours of the Duchess were free from pain The immediate cause of dissolution was an entire decay of vital power; the proximate cause was, doubtless, the severe attack of spasms which prostrated the little remaining strength she had, and, though dropsy or water on the chest supervened, yet it was not that which proved fatal in its effects. The Royal Duchess was unable to make the least mark of recognition to any of the members of the Royal family.

But little can be added to the brief mortuary record of the late Princess' names and titles. From first to last hers was an amiable and a happy life. She was distinguished in early years for grace of person and elegance of taste, and was eminent in every female accomplishment. Her style of conversation, if not brilliant, was remarkable for facile and harmless wit, and kindness of feeling, yet cleverness of direction. Like all the children of that Royal family of George III.—of which England at one time used to be so proud—the Princess Mary was beautiful in youth and comely in after life.

The marriage of her Royal Highness did not take place until the ripe age of forty Yet we have to look back a ful. forty years to find July 23, 1816. It is a glimpse of another age to read of Louis Philippe and his Duchess as present at the ceremony, and that the 'persons invited were exactly those invited to the marriage of the Princess Charlotte, it being considered a private wedding" They consisted, in addition to the Royal family, "of the Duke and Duchess of Orleans, Mdlle. Orleans, the Duke de Bourbon, and several other foreigners of distinction, the foreign Ambassadors and Ministers with their ladies, the Lord Chancellor with the Cabinet Ministers and their ladies, the Deputy Earl Marshal of England, the great officers of State, and the household; the Kings, the Queen's, and those of the Windsor establishment; the suites of all the Royal Dukes, the Duchess of York, the Princess Charlotte, Prince Leopold, the Princesses Augusta and Elizabeth, the Princess Sophia of Gloucester, the Staff of the Duke of York (as Commander-in-Chief), the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, the Master of the Rolls, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Cornwall, and other law officers." Of all these great personages, not one survives but Prince Leopold and the Duchess of Orleans.

The Duke, of course, arrives. Then we have "the consent of the Regent in Council to the marriage, with the great seal of England affixed, produced to the Archbishop to enable him to proceed with the marriage, signed by the Lord Chancellor and other State officers."

Among the incidents of her Royal Highness' early life may be mentioned the romantic attachment entertained for her by Dr. Turton, a celebrated physician of the last century; but the statement of his having bequeathed property to the illustrious object of his affection is altogether untrue.

In the Court Journal it is stated that the late Duchess, besides a large sum of money, was possessed of much valuable property, and was especially rich in jewels, her diamonds being as fine as any possessed by the Royal family, the Queen alone excepted. Of laces, too, of that quality the art of making which, if not extinct, is certainly not now practised, the late Duchess had a large store, and of very great value; her collection is, perhaps, not to be surpassed in this country. The accumulation is easily accounted for. On the death of Queen Charlotte all her laces and jewels were publicly sold, and it was known that the choicest specimens were purchased by the Princesses, her daughters; and the same system has been pursued on the death of every female member of the family of George III., till the most beautiful specimens of each collection have centred in the possession of the last survivor the Duchess of Gloucester. Of the nature of the will her Royal Highness has left nothing is formally known; but it is supposed that the bulk of the jewels and the rarest of the laces will be inherited by the Princesses of Cambridge, especially by the Princess Mary, who was her godchild, and a great favourite of her venerable aunt.

From that day the life of the Princess Mary was one of tranquillity, undisturbed but by the death of her husband in 1834. She lived to be the "dear cousin and good aunt" to a new Royal family, whose devoted attachment her unvarying kindness and affection won for her.

THE LATE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.

The Duchess of Gloucester died at Gloucester House, at the corner of Park-lane. We have engraved a View of the mansion, which was previously the Earl of Elgin's, and here were deposited the Elgin Marbles. Lord Byron calls Elgin House "a stone shop," and

For all the mutilated Blocks of art.—E Bards and S. Reviewers.

The marbles were next removed to Burlington House, and to the British Museum in 1816. Gloucester House was next taken for a term by the Duke of Gloucester, on his marriage with the Princess Mary. In the state drawing room is a needlework carpet, presented to the Duchess of Gloucester upon her birthday, by 34 ladies of the aristocracy, each having worked a compartment.

GLOUCESTER HOUSE, PICCADILLY, THE RESIDENCE OF THE LATE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.

THE ST. JOHN'S FOUNDATION SCHOOL, KILBURN.

ST. JOHN'S FOUNDATION SCHOOL FOR SONS OF POOR CLERGYMEN OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

THIS edifice presents a striking object to the traveller by the London and North-Western Railway, it being situate to the right of the line, on the London side of the Kilburn station.

The St. John's School, designed to afford a sound education to the sons of clergymen of the Church of England of limited means without cost or charge of any kind, was originated about five years since, by some benevolent gentlemen resident in St. John's Wood and its neighbourhood. They had long seen and felt that, while many excellent societies afforded to orphans of clergymen the assistance of which they stood in need, there existed no institution to lend a helping hand to the labourer while still "bearing the burden and heat of the day." Such a person is too frequently unable from his narrow income to provide in a suitable manner for those dependent on him, much less to give them such education as may make them useful members of society.

There are in England and Wales nearly 400 benefices under £50 a year; and at the lowest estimate there are 3600 beneficed clergymen whose incomes do not amount to £150 per annum. Again, a large proportion of the clergy are stipendiary curates, whose average incomes are less than £100 per annum. These facts show most strongly the necessity which exists for such an institution as the above.

St. John's School has been recently enlarged, and is now emerging from the condition of a local school to that of one intended for the Church generally. There are already twenty-five scholars on the foundation—a small number in comparison with the many applicants for admission.

We trust that the anniversary festival of the foundation, to be celebrated on Monday next, the 11th inst., will be the means of adding largely to the funds, by many of the guests being induced to become donors and subscribers to this admirable institution.

LONDON STREET ARCHITECTURE.—LOMBARD-STREET.

AT the north-east corner of Lombard-street and Clement's lane the Royal Insurance Company have just erected a new office, which illustrates the tasteful advance which is being made in improving the architecture of the metropolis.

The building is from the designs of Mr. John Belcher, of Adelaide-place, London-bridge, architect. With the exception of a granite plinth, the edifice is entirely faced with Portland stone. The style adopted is the Renaissance, and displays in its execution great taste and elegance.

"The ground floor (says a writer in the Land and Building News) is composed externally of a series of semicircular-headed arches, separated from each other by panelled pilasters, over which is a cornice broken round them, enriched with dentils. On the projections of this cornice are dwarf pedestals, between which is open balustrading. The first-floor windows are also semicircular-headed, and have archivolts round them, in which are inserted guilloche ornaments. These archivolts rest on enriched capitals and panelled pilasters. The two pair windows have plain moulded architraves and archivolts, with enriched key-stones and spandrils. Above these is a string-course, composed of a Vitruvian scroll and dentils above its bed moulding. The upper windows are comparatively plain, over which, at the eaves, is a bold and effective cornice, the corona of which is supported by moulded trusses and modillions. The style appears to be well adapted to street architecture. On the ground floor of the interior of the edifice is a general-business room, at the south end of which is the staircase communicating with the upper apartments. At this end is also a mezzanine floor, occupying a space used as the secretary's-room. On the first floor is the board-room. Taken as a whole, and notwithstanding its contracted site, we consider this building one of the most successful specimens of street architecture which adorns the city of London."

Of the success of the Royal Insurance Company, and the extent of its business, we gather some idea from the Times' Money Article of 24th July last, relating to Fire Insurance Companies, in which it is stated that the transactions of the Royal have been "of a perfectly satisfactory character." The analysis of the company's returns for the three years ending 1855 showed the large total of £871,937 fire premiums in that period; and an amount of losses and expenses of £296,020; leaving a total surplus of £75,937 on the Fire branch alone in the three years. The rapid expansion of the company has continued since that time, as the fire premiums only in the past year reached the amount of £130,000—a revenue which, it is believed, only three or four fire-offices in the kingdom can equal. Its Life branch appears to have been equally prosperous; the number of policies issued last year having exceeded 700—assuring about £340,000, and producing new premiums alone of more than £10,000. The total paid up capital and accumulated funds of this company are declared to amount to nearly half a million.

LORD ZETLAND'S "VEDETTE," THE WINNER OF THE TWO THOUSAND GUINEAS STAKES AT NEWMARKET.—DRAWN BY HARRY HALL.—(SEE NEXT PAGE)

"VEDETTE," THE WINNER OF THE TWO THOUSAND GUINEA STAKES, AT NEWMARKET.

In our Journal of last week we described the very interesting "Two Thousand." We now engrave the Winner, from a drawing by Mr. Harry Hall, of Newmarket. Vedette is a dark-brown horse, standing fifteen hands two inches high; he is of great power, has a large though not coarse head, strong neck, good shoulders, well laid back, good barrel, back, and quarters, which droop a little; plenty of bone, wide hips, and is very muscular. His action is peculiar—like all the Voltigeurs, his head making an acute angle with his neck.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The wretched exhibition which Blink Bonny made of herself in the One Thousand proves that the rumours we recorded—as to her being very rough and blotchy in her coat, odd in her temper, and not the least improved, so far back as the early part of January—were only too well founded. This mare, for which 3000 sovs. is said, refused, is now not worth £600, if that, as it is evident, she cannot stay, and, if the jockeys are correct, is a "high-blower" into the bargain. Imperieuse, the winner, is a smart mare with good substance; but Tasmania is still far below her real form, and will not be so easily got rid of in the Oaks. Adamas, offered and paid both in the Chester Cup and The Dee, must not be lost sight of for the Derby, for which the Fitzmoltes have another local fancy, Sweet William, by Sweetmeat. The idea of Anton having been defeated in the Two Thousand, because there was only a poor pace, is an utter delusion. The bad pace was his best chance, and yet he had not the heart to climb the hill. When John Day can try a mare, like Mincepie, to stay a distance, we must distrust his calculations, and fancy that his long-race pioneer Rogerthorpe must have lost all form. For substance Anton is far below Highflyer Andover, and can have, like Loyola, no earthly chance for the Derby. Sydney's party complain sadly that not use enough was made of him on the Two Thousand, and he will prove over the Derby course that he is one of the staying order.

The defeat of Fisherman by Gemma di Vergy (which reversed the Warwick fiat), a third wretched performance on the part of Melissa, and the victory of Longrange, the first of the Longbows, marked the Tuesday of the Chester meeting. Leamington, 6st. 9lb., and ridden by D. Hughes, one of the most rising young jockeys of the day, won the Chester Cup cleverly by a neck; Drumour was still "a little off" when he went for the Two Thousand, running only 6 lb. for his year, and running him gamely home. Dulcamara was third, and Riseber, Lance, Gemma di Vergy, and Polestar well up, out of the remaining thirty-three. Leamington was kept with great tact to short distances last year, and hence his light weight, which caused him to be selected and kept as first favourite from the appearance of the weights till just before the race, when Commotion superseded him, and drove him to 5 to 1. Mr. Hibbert said, "It will be remembered, was second with Yellow Jack for this race last year; and first, in 1855, with Scythian, who is now located within a stone's throw of old Glencoe in Kentucky. Warlock and Mincepie, the St. Leger and Oaks winners of last year, made no sign in the race. It is rumoured that Ellington, the third of that very feeble trio, is only lent, not sold, to Baron Rothschild.

Mr. A. Johnstone's death will be a great loss to Doncaster, to whose course he was so stanch a friend, and of whose Thursday sale his lot of Charles the Twelfths, Verulams, and latterly Touchstones and Annandales have formed such a leading feature. He began to race in 1840, and won 3000 gs. for Charles XII., who won him, among other races, two Goodwood Cups and a thousand-guinea a-side match (arising out of the first of them) against Hyllus. He first brought out, so to speak, Job Marson (of whose appearance in the saddle in future there seems great doubt), and was still his first master when he died. Tom Dawson trained his horses; but, since Charles XII., Rowena, The General, and Rotherham have been almost his only winners. Annandale was his favourite sire, and he was so fond of the Touchstone blood that he purchased Launcelot when a rising twenty for 1000 gs. For many years he leased the celebrated Rufford from the late Mr. Plummer, and he died on the very day when his 1800-guinea yearling, Lord of the Hills, made such a wretched exhibition in the Two Thousand.

Shrewsbury (on Tuesday and Wednesday) and Ludlow (on Thursday and Friday) are the racing fixtures for next week; and we are glad to see that Mr. Trail goes so stoutly for the 9 st. raising system, which seems, unhappily, to find no favour in Yorkshire.

Hunter sales are very brisk at Tattersall's. Nineteen of the Bicester Hunt horses came to the hammer on the 13th, and thirteen of Mr. Craven's on the 21st of May; while the twelve Worcestershire Hunt horses will be sold at Bretherton's (Birmingham) on Thursday. Tom Dowdeswell, the first whip to Ben Morgan with Lord Middleton's hounds, has been engaged as huntsman to the South Berkshire, and received a handsome silver horn from the latter on leaving his country—a testimony of respect very rarely paid to a whip on promotion. Mr. Davis's testimonial has already more than 100 good names down to it, but nothing is as yet fixed as to the form of the presentation plate. The subscription-book is at Messrs. Bone's, of Piccadilly, and we trust that it will soon contain at least thrice as many names.

On Monday the Cambridge University eight-oared races commence: the Arundel Unity have their four-oared race from Putney to Barnes on the same day; and Tuesday is big with the fate of Kelly and Messenger, who row from Putney to Mortlake for £200 a side and the championship of the Thames.

THE RUSSIAN CUP.—When the Emperor Nicholas visited England in 1844, he announced his intention of giving annually a sum of £200 sterling, to purchase a silver cup to be run for at the Ascot races, and the sum was given each year up to 1853. The Emperor Alexander has now decided that it shall no longer be given, and that the cup intended for that shall be run for at the races which are to take place this year at Moscow.—Letter from St Petersburg.

AN UNFULFILLED COMPLIMENT.—The Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, revealed yesterday to his own church a little compliment which has at last unlocked for. At the termination of the morning service Mr Beecher had completed a reading of the closing hymn, a well-dressed man, about fifty years of age, and of very respectable appearance, arose from his seat in the far corner of the gallery, and standing erect, with his arms folded, addressed the rev. gentleman in a loud voice. All eyes were instantly turned upon the speaker, the house was perfectly silent, while the minister and congregation waited anxiously to hear what the interrupter of the ceremonies had to say. Having secured the attention of the audience, the latter individual again addressing the pulpit, made the following remark: "I only wished to say, Sir, that if your dinners are as good as your sermons, I should not object to dining with you some day. As Mr. Beecher did not extend the expected invitation, or vouch-safe to recite to the stranger his bill of fare for the day, there was nothing more to be said on that head, and at the conclusion of the services the unknown epicure departed, evidently in a state of great disgust.—New York Tribune, April 13.

Proposals have been issued by the Post-office department of the United States for carrying the entire letter mail from the Mississippi to San Francisco in four-horse coaches, semi-monthly, weekly, and semi-weekly.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE Agamemnon, 91, is fitting at Portsmouth to assist in laying down the Atlantic telegraph cable.

THE 7th Fusiliers, 883d Regiment, the 3rd battalion of the Rifle Brigade, and another regiment, probably the 3rd battalion of the 60th Rifles, will proceed to India as soon as tonnage can be procured for their conveyance.

THE paddlewheel steam-frigate Furious, 16, and the screw steam store-ship Hesper, sailed from Plymouth on Monday afternoon for China, with two dispatch-boats and twelve gun-boats—viz., the Surprise, Cormorant, the Algerine, the Lee, the Banterer, the Lorn, the Kestrel, the Drake, the Janus, the Firm, the Watchful, the Woodcock, the Stanch, and the Leven

THE Mersey, 40, the large steam-frigate building at Chatham Dockyard, is progressing rapidly, and already some idea can be formed of her immense size. She will be the longest steam-frigate in the service, being considerably longer than the Royal Sovereign, 131 recently launched at Portsmouth.

The following are the principal dimensions of the Mersey: Length over all, 336 ft.; length between perpendiculars, 300 ft.; length of keel for tonnage, 264 ft. 4 in.; extreme breadth, 52 ft.; breadth for tonnage, 51 ft. 3 in.; breadth moulded, 50 ft. 8 in.; depth of hold, 19 ft. 10 in. Burden, 3730 70-94 tons. Her engines will be of 1000-horse power.

THE POISONINGS IN HONG-KONG.—Professor Liebig has analysed the bread sent to him from Hong-Kong, and has found it to contain a quarter gramme of arsenic for every fifty grammes of bread, or more than sufficient to cause death. The arsenic was spread over the whole surface of the bread, which proved that the poison had been mixed up with the dough.—Augsburg Gazette.

THE LAST OF THE GLENGARRY ESTATES.—The extensive estate of Knoydart, bordering upon the wild Loch Hourn, in the West Highlands, is, we observe, announced for sale. The fact is interesting, for it is synonymous with the extinction in the Highlands of the old chiefs of Glengarry, who for many centuries held sway in this country. The Glengarry family were confirmed in their large estates by King Robert II., in 1373; but their history goes back to the days of Somerled, the King or Lord of the Isles, in the 11th century. In all the clan feuds and Jacobite risings of the West Highlands the Glengarry banner was conspicuous, and their war-cry, "Craggan an Phitish" ("The Rock of the Raven), was heard in many a bloody fight. The chief who died in 1828 attempted to revive the ancient importance of the clan, but the power was gone. The population had been chiefly transferred to Canada; part after part of the extensive possessions was sold—the principal portion is now the property of Lord Ward, and the Right Hon. Edward Ellice is also proprietor of a considerable part: and with the sale of Knoydart will depart the last of the estates held by this once powerful family.—Inverness Courier.

VACCINATION.—The following queries have been addressed on behalf of the General Board of Health to the French Government, and to various foreign medical societies and Continental physicians.—1. Whether vaccination, in most cases, protects from smallpox, and, at all events, prevents death thereby? 2. Whether individuals who have been vaccinated, and are consequently less liable to smallpox, become more susceptible to typhoid fever, and other zymotic diseases; or to scrofula and phthisis; or exhibit any other injurious consequences? 3. Whether in the lymph of a genuine Jennerian pustule the seed of syphilitic, scrofulous, or other constitutional disease can be conveyed and inoculated through vaccination; and whether a skilful physician can commit the error to take from a vaccinated arm any other morbid secretion than the vaccine lymph for further transmission? 4. Whether, if every necessary precaution for the proper performance of the operation be taken, and that in the individual case no reasons against it be present, the universal vaccination of children is to be recommended? Translated from the Vienna "Medicinisches Doctenblatt."

Persons in America directing letters for London should be careful to put the initial letters of the metropolitan district intended above the word "London," and not after it. A leading banker in New York having transmitted bills for £70,000 in a letter directed "London, W.C.," it was carried to London, Canada.

The Courrier de Paris states that Rossini has just composed six new melodies, which will be shortly published. The writer of the paragraph says he has not heard them, but has seen them, he having been one of a party to whom Madame Rossini showed the new compositions on the 1st of May.

The Washington correspondent of the Exeter News-Letter (New Hampshire), says that General Pierce has saved one-half his Presidential salary The Presidents have generally left the White House poorer than they entered it, but Mr. Pierce has practised New Hampshire economy and saved 50,000 dollars.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

NOTWITHSTANDING that there has been a good demand for money for commercial purposes, and that the Bank of France is still offering a premium of 12s. per £100 on gold, all National Stocks have been in somewhat active request this week, and prices have advanced nearly one per cent. This improvement in the quotations is attributed to the favourable nature of the Continental and American exchanges, the recommencement of bullion imports from the United States, the comparative ease in the value of money abroad, and the prospect of steady arrivals of gold from Australia during the next two or three weeks; besides, scarcely any bullion has been withdrawn from the Bank of England for export purposes, and about £100,000 in gold has been sent into that establishment. With all these features, however, money still continues dear, the lowest rate at the Lombard-street for 60 days and 3 months' paper being 6½ for 4 months', 6½.

The last packet from Mexico having brought a large supply of silver, the demand for that metal has fallen off, more especially as the inquiry for India and China is confined to comparatively small parcels. The next mail is expected to carry out under £500,000.

The subscription list for the Russian railway scheme has been closed. With the exception of those who have Russian connections, no subscribers' names have been handed in; indeed, the whole affair has turned out a much greater failure than was at first anticipated. We must remember that no statement will be made of the actual sums subscribed for in this country.

The £2,000,000 of Exchequer Bonds to be paid off this week are chiefly in the hands of the Commissioners of the Savings Banks, who will, we understand, convert the amount in Exchequer Bills. This will relieve the market of an uneven pressure, which has rendered the latter securities considerably below a floating point

Some changes have been suggested in the new charter of the Bank of France. The total amount of capital will, we understand, be raised to £12,000,000, one-third of which is to be invested in Rentes, and the remainder is to be employed in discounting commercial paper. We may add that the prohibition in reference to the Bank not charging more than 6 per cent for discount is likely to be rescinded.

There was a full average doing in Home Stocks on Monday, and prices were steadily on the advance:—Bank Stock marked 212 to 213; The Three per Cents Reduced were 91¾¾; Consols for Money, 92¾ to 93⅛, Ditto for Account, 93⅛ to 93⅜; New Three per Cents, 91¾ 92½; New Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 77¼; Long Annuities, 1859, 2-3-16; India Stock, 220; India Bonds, 10s. d.s; Exchequer Bills, 1s. prem. to 6s. dis.; Exchequer Stock, 99⅛. On Tuesday the market generally was very firm, and the quotations were again higher:—Bank Stock, 211 to 213; Three per Cents Reduced, 92½ to 92⅝; Consols, 93⅛; New Three per Cents, 92⅝; Long Annuities, 1860, 2 7-16; Ditto, 1859, 2⅛; Exchequer Bills, 2s. to 6s. dis. There was increased firmness in the market on Wednesday, at improved quotations:—Bank Stock was 213; the Three per Cent Reduced were 92⅝ 92; Three per Cent Consols, 92⅝ ⅜; New Three per Cents, were 92⅝ ⅜; Long Annuities, 1860, 2⅛; Ditto, 1859, 2 3-16; Ditto 1885, 18; India Bonds, 220 to 221; India Bonds, 4s. dis.; Exchequer Bills, 1s. dis. to 3s. prem.; Exchequer Bonds, 99¾. In the early part of the day on Thursday higher rates prevailed; but, as the directors of the Bank of England gave notice that they had called in their loans upon Stock and had suspended the description of accommodation, subsequently the market became heavy, at drooping prices:—The Three per Cents, for Money were done at 92⅝, closing at 93 to 92½; for Account the same were 92⅝ to 92⅝. The New Three per Cents were 92⅝ ⅜; and the Reduced, 92⅝ ⅜. Exchequer Bills were March, 2s. dis. to 2s. prem.; June, 4s. to 1s. discount.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE, May 4.—About an average time-of-year supply of English wheat was on sale this morning's market, and its general quality can hold a slight improvement. In some cases a quarter more money was paid for good and fine samples; but other kinds moved off slowly, at last week's currency. The show of foreign wheat was good, and the trade ruled inactive, at late rates. [illegible] arrivals of grain were held at high rates. The malt trade was in a sluggish state, at last week's prices. For oats there was a fair demand, at 6d to 1s. 3d. per quarter. Beans and peas were in good request, at late currency. The flour trade was steady, at full quotations.

ENGLISH GRAIN.—The supplies of grain marketed were but moderate. The demand was steady, at full prices. [illegible] supplied with most kinds of grain.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

In our last publication we gave a report of the first day's proceedings of the new Parliament. Since then the only business transacted up to Thursday was the swearing in of the members, which commenced on Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—SATURDAY, MAY 2.

The Speaker, attired in his full robes, took the chair at twelve o'clock, and the swearing in of members was forthwith proceeded with. The members present in the House were sworn in batches of about thirty each, and the time occupied in taking the oaths, signing the official rolls, and in other forms, was generally half an hour for each full batch. Among the gentlemen elected for counties or boroughs in England who took the oaths during the earlier part of the day's sitting, and whose names are familiar to the public, may be mentioned Mr. Thornely, the seconder of the nomination of Mr. Evelyn Denison for Speaker of the House of Commons; Mr. C. Villiers, Sir W. Williams, the hero of Kars; and Mr. W. Williams, the member for Lambeth; Mr. Roebuck and Mr. Hadfield, the two members for Sheffield; Mr. Newdegate and Mr. Spooner, the political twins of North Warwickshire; Mr. Muntz, General Thompson, Sir R. Peel, Mr. B. Osborne; Mr. Akroyd, the successful competitor of Mr. Cobden at the Huddersfield election; and Sir C. Burrell, who dates his first appearance in Parliament half a century back.

Among the representatives of the other portions of the United Kingdom "sworn in" during the first half of the sitting were Mr. A. Dunlop, Lord Duncan, Mr. W. Fagan, Colonel French, and Mr. H. Herbert.

Among the members sworn later in the afternoon were Sir J. Graham, Mr. Hayter, Mr. Massey, Mr. Cowper, Lord Ashley, Sir William Jolliffe, Mr. S. Warren, Sir De Lacy Evans, Lord Cavendish, Mr. Sholefield, Lord Elcho, Sir J. S. Trelawney, Mr. Herbert Ingram; Mr. G. A. Hamilton, Mr. H. Barkeley, Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Kinglake, Mr. Locke King, Sir R. Carden, Mr. Rolt, and Sir Erskine Perry. More than 150 members took the oaths during the day. The House adjourned at four o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack a few minutes before four o'clock.

The swearing in of the Peers was then proceeded with.

Amongst those who took the oaths were the following:—The Archbishops of Canterbury and York; Bishops of Winchester, St. David's, St. Asaph, Bangor, and Carlisle; Lord Lyndhurst, Earl Grey; the Earls of Malmesbury, Tankerville, Aberdeen, Albemarle, and Eglinton; the Duke of Somerset, Lord Scudes, the Marquis of Donegall; the Lords Foley, De Ros, Colville; the Earls of Stradbroke, Carnarvon Mornington, Mayo, and Bradford.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The House met at one; but some time was spent before a sufficient number mustered to enable it to proceed to the business of swearing in the members. A paper was sent up to the gallery for publication, expressing a hope that in future members would be more punctual and that so much time would not be lost in the tedious operation. As it was, the swearing was proceeded with in small batches—mostly of four or five, at last—with long intervals between each. The alphabetical list was finished on Saturday, and members were sworn as the arrived.

Ninety-one members were sworn on Monday. Amongst them were many of the Ministers—Sir G. Grey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer the Attorney-General, Mr. Labouchere, Sir B. Hall, Mr. Bouverie, Mr. Vernon Smith, Mr. Fitzroy, and Mr. Lowe. On the other side, Sir J. Pakington, Lord Stanley, and Lord J. Manners took the oaths. The gentlemen who have been returned for the first time to Parliament will have a good many difficulties to encounter in connection with their conduct in the House of Commons, and must not be surprised if they are assailed with loud cries of "Order, order," when they are unwittingly violating Parliamentary etiquette. On Monday afternoon Mr. Roupell, the new member for Lambeth, entered the House enveloped in a capacious circular cloak, and wearing his hat. There is no Parliamentary law against the cloak, but it is a grave offence against House of Commons' good manners for a member to walk into the presence of the Speaker with his hat on. As soon as a member enters the House he is bound by custom to remove his hat, to make a respectful bow to the Speaker, and not restore his hat to its usual quarters until he has settled down in his seat. Mr. Roupell, who appeared to be unacquainted with these regulations, walked boldly into the House, failed to remove his hat, and took no notice of the Speaker. "Order, order," proceeded from a multitude of voices, when Mr. Roupell was informed by a friend that the remonstrances were addressed to him, and explained the circumstances which called them forth. By this time he was in his seat, but he took off his hat and placed it by his side, where it stood during the remainder of the time he was in the House, the honourable member not being aware that he enjoyed the privilege of wearing it while he was "in his place." Another new member made a faux pas of a different kind. There was some difficulty on Monday in getting together the forty members necessary to constitute "a House;" and twenty or thirty members sat for nearly half an hour in gloomy silence, anxiously awaiting new arrivals. An honourable member tired of the monotony, hastily rose from his seat, and was about beating a retreat, but he had not quite reached the door when he was informed by the Serjeant-at-Arms that, though he was free from arrest out of doors, that privilege did not apply to the space within the walls of Parliament, and that under the circumstances he could go no further, but must return to his seat. As soon as "a House" was made he would be at full liberty to retire, but not till then. The hon. gentleman returned to his seat, the gainer of an important piece of experience with regard to Parliamentary etiquette. A very common error into which new members fall is that of walking between the Speaker and the member who is addressing the House—an offence of a very high order, which invariably brings down thunders of indignant remonstrance from the more experienced senators. This breach of good manners the new members have not yet had much opportunity of committing.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at four o'clock.

About thirty Peers took the oaths, among whom were the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Earl of Clarendon, the Marquis of Salisbury, Lord Campbell, Lord Wensleydale, Viscount Falkland, the Marquis of Westmeath, the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Bishop of London, and Lord Feltimore.

The Duke of Devonshire also took the oaths. His Grace, who walked with great difficulty, appeared to have lost the use of his right arm, and subscribed the rolls of Parliament with his left hand.

Their Lordships adjourned at five o'clock until next day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at a few minutes after two o'clock, and the ceremony of swearing in members returned to serve the new Parliament was resumed. Among those who presented themselves at the table and took the oaths during the earlier portion of the sitting were General Wyndham, Colonel Lowther, Sir F. Kelly, Colonel North, Mr. Ricardo, Mr. Wyse, and the Right Hon. E. Ellice.

Lord J. Russell, Lord Ingestre, Mr. E. B. Denison, and Mr. Mackinnon were subsequently sworn in.

The House adjourned at four until next day.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

Baring, Mr. Cairns, and Mr. Danby Seymour. Mr. Pease made the affirmation provided to be taken by members of the Society of Friends.

The House adjourned at four till next day.

THE MONUMENT TO EDMUND BURKE.—A lecture was delivered on the 21st ult., at the room of the Literary and Scientific Society, Beaconsfield, by Peter Burke, Esq. of the Inner Temple, on the "Life and Writings of Edmund Burke," whose remains lie interred in the parish church of Beaconsfield, and for the restoration of whose tomb there, and the erection of a suitable memorial to whom, a subscription is now on foot. This lecture, minute in detail, was interesting and instructive; and, while useful in point of education, it was not the less gratifying. Edmund Burke, as portrayed in the lecture, was at once a statesman, a philanthropist, a philosopher, a genius, and also an agreeable and amiable man in society; and, like the greatest men that have arisen at times, leaving behind them a name as enduring as the old oak, his grandeur took its rise from a comparatively low beginning. We mean, of course, the comparative station he set out with, contrasted with the lofty and dignified position he held at the close of life. The lecturer sketched graphically the whole course, private and political, of this orator and statesman, so widely known to fame, prominently marking out, as he went on, Edmund Burke's rise, meridian, and glorious setting. The lecture was listened to by a crowded audience with marked attention; and at the conclusion a vote of thanks proposed by Mr Sheppard, of Beaconsfield, and seconded by the Rev. Gould Ross) was conveyed to the lecturer by the chairman, the Rev. S. E. Majot.

THE CHURCH OF ST. PETER, Broughton-cum-Tilkey, Oxfordshire, was consecrated on Easter Tuesday, April 14th, by the Lord Bishop of Oxford. The church is in the Early Decorated style consisting of a nave, north aisle, and chancel, terminated by an apse, from the designs of Mr. G. E. Street, of London, the diocesan architect. The sermon was preached by the Lord Bishop of Oxford.

ST. GEORGE'S SCHOOLS, BATTERSEA-PARK.—These schools, which stand fronting the open fields in a very fine situation adjoining the South-Western Railway, were opened on the 30th of April. They form a large and handsome pile of buildings, comprising three schools—for boys, girls, and infants, with three separate residences for the teachers—and are calculated for educating 600 children. They are built of white brick, with stone windows and copings. The roofs are open, with admirable provision for ventilation, and are covered with ornamental tiles. The scheme for erecting these schools originated in a vote of the vestry of a portion of certain funds which has been received by the parish in compensation from the Commissioners of Woods and Forests on forming the new park. This, however, formed but a small portion of the whole. The Government grant was large, and the site was very liberally given by the freeholder, the remainder of the funds being collected by private subscriptions. The architect of the schools was Mr. Joseph Peacock, and they will form a feature in this improving neighbourhood in which the park is making rapid progress toward completion.

INTERESTING TO THE INTEMPERATE CLASSES.—The New York State Legislature has passed an Act to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors, of a stringent character. It contains the following clauses:—No inn, tavern, or hotel keeper, who shall trust any person other than those who may be lodgers in his house for any sort of strong or spirituous liquors or wines, shall be capable of recovering the same by any suit. Licenses that may be granted (except to inn, tavern, or hotel keepers to sell strong or spirituous liquors or wines, in quantities less than five gallons, shall not be deemed to authorise the sale of any strong or spirituous liquor or wine to be drunk in the house or shop, outhouse, yard, or garden. [The sale of liquors "to be drunk on the premises" is, therefore, entirely prohibited.] Another section says:—It shall not be lawful to sell intoxicating liquors to any person guilty of habitual drunkenness, nor to any person against whom the seller may have been notified by parent, guardian, husband, or wife, not to sell intoxicating liquors. It shall be the duty of magistrates and overseers of the poor in any town or city, on complaint and satisfactory proof by a wife that her husband is an habitual drinker of intoxicating liquors, to issue written notices to all dealers in intoxicating liquors forbidding the sale or giving of such liquor to such husband for the term of six months from the date of the notice, under a penalty of 50 dollars.

REV. THEODORE PARKER.—At the annual meeting of the "Twenty-eighth Congregational Society" of Boston, held on the 8th of April, it was voted to increase the yearly salary of the Pastor, the Rev. Mr. Parker a vacation of six months, on account of his ill health, and to supply the pulpit during that time.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THERE can be but few persons who have not a tinge of that feeling which made Charles Lamb reluctant to part even from doubtful or disagreeable things which use had made familiar, and which caused change of any sort to discompose him. It may, perhaps, be some such sensation which induces those who have been accustomed to the personnel of the old House of Commons to look with dubious favour on that of the new one. When on the first day of their assembling the neophytes of the House of Commons wandered or stood in uneasy attitudes about the floor, timid as to their titles to seats, and conscious of being embarrassed with regard to their hats, there were not wanting observations little commendatory of their appearance en masse, and still less so as individual members were singled out for criticism in detail. There ought, however, to be some little consideration shown towards middle-aged Englishmen who, by nationality and temperament, are ill qualified to know exactly what to do with their limbs when introduced for the first time into a strange room and strange company. The old members did their best in the way of "chaperonage;" and, with a due recollection of the time when they had to blunder their own way to initiation, instructed, by precept and example, their weaker brethren in the art of being at home in their seats in that queer little room in which it has pleased Sir Charles Barry to locate the third estate of the realm. By-the-by, it may be said that the capabilities of that said room were severely tried on this occasion; and it proved to be by no means adequate to the requirements of the House of Commons when gathered in numbers, which neither casualties nor indifference were likely to thin.

A very natural curiosity was exhibited for an early and general inspection of the new Speaker; for, notwithstanding threats of Mr. Walpole, and hints of Mr. Baines, to be set up by Mr. Roebuck; as his first step in the way of Administrative reform, it was well known that Mr. Evelyn Denison was to be the man. But that gentleman contrived to shroud himself with some success in the crowd; and it was not until he rose after the slight pause which followed the speech of the seconder of the motion for his appointment that the uninitiated members were able to discover what manner of man he was. Then, however, they became aware that he was tall, slightly made, with a moderate stoop of the shoulders, a face long and large featured, an overhanging brow and deep-set eyes, the complexion pale and rather sallow, the head bald, and (a noteworthy circumstance in these barbate days) no whiskers or other capillary developments. His voice is clear, but not loud; his utterance most measured and precise, and his intonation marked. There is no alacrity in his movements; and his step is unsteady and swerving, preventing in that respect a marked contrast to the firm and stately march of Mr. Shaw Lefevre. All Mr. Evelyn Denison's personal merits and defects were severely tested on the day after his election, when he entered the House for the first time, accompanied by his train. It is, no doubt, a trying occasion. The form of the Speaker is developed in all its perfections or imperfections, as the case may be, by a rigidly exact Court dress, without the framework or background of a robe; while a short wig, of the pattern of that worn by barristers, completes a dress such as George III. delighted in. Sir Charles Grandison himself, although to some such costume almost born, and certainly bred, would have felt odd, if not abashed, at finding himself suddenly thrust in the midst of 400 or 500 gentlemen standing up to receive him in the loose dingy frocks and chimneypot hats of this day, all of them looking at him critically, some dubiously, and many with a strong sense of the ludicrous impressed upon their countenances. No wonder, then, that Mr. Evelyn Denison paused for a moment as he reached the bar, faltered, bowed twice instead of once, and looked anxiously for support to the Serjeant-at-Arms. Revived, probably, by a glance at the cognate habiliments of his chief henchmen, and impressed by the aspect of the mace—stern emblem of his authority—he recovered himself, and made his way towards the table; but still unsteadily, and without the authoritative directness of stride which becomes a Speaker. His nervousness was also exemplified by the manner in which for the first time he uttered the mystic words "Order! order!" which prefaced his statement of the approval of her Majesty of the choice of the House in his person; and it was only by the aid of the voices of the old members, who appointed themselves a sort of Parliamentary special constables for the moment, that his subdued appeal to the ears of the House was made to avail. With the assumption of his robes and full-bottomed wig on a subsequent day the new Speaker seemed to have also "assumed his state." His manner grew assured, his voice more steady and sonorous; and it would not be at all surprising if before another week he is in a condition to deal with refractory members (if one can suppose such a thing), even to the extent of resorting to that magical exercise of authority which is contained in the act of "naming them."

The process of swearing in the members of a new Parliament implies a week of depressing endurance on the part of those who are obliged to take a share in it, and in the present instance there is a want of alacrity on the part of honourable gentlemen to submit themselves to the process, which is unusual. In four days only as many hundreds were sworn in; and the delays which have arisen from the want of a sufficient number to make a House have been considerable. There have been moments when the functionaries—doomed to four hours of ambient silence and stillness in that strange chamber, which looks so chill and uncomfortable by daylight—have wished that Baron Rothschild would present himself to be sworn. The excitement of searching for an Old Testament—a book which Sir Robert Inglis once said he doubted whether the House of Commons possessed in their collection—would have been something; while the prospect of an ante-debate on Jewish disabilities might have brought back lingering members from the Art-Treasures Exhibition at Manchester, while it certainly would have thinned the Congress of M.P.-dom which the May meetings might have gathered at Exeter-hall. However, the weariest week, must come to an end; and, for the second time in this year, the ceremonial of a Royal Speech, delivered with "mained rites" by commission, and the moving and seconding of addresses in answer thereto, have been gone through, and the House of Commons is thoroughly constituted once more for the business of the nation. In a short time the new members will be absorbed in the old mass. They will begin to learn the lesson which all who enter the House of Commons must learn, namely, that that sin gular and original body is only to be approached, wooed, and won in one way by all sorts of persons. They will learn that it is a body without any prejudices, except against bores—that it is utterly indifferent to the antecedents, the country, and almost to the character, of the new man. He who comes to it with a good reputation has no better chance than he who besieges it with none, or even with a bad one. It rejects all pretensions it has not of itself justified, and all fame which it has not of itself conferred—judging most severely and critically those who have attained position independent of it, and of whom it consequently expects and exacts much in justification of that position. A man may be very rich or very poor—a millionaire or an adventurer—his chances are equal. This is not the common notion, but observation shows that it is the correct one; and that, indeed, in all its judgments the House of Commons is governed by the utmost impartiality, and even republican enlightenment. For every one of its members there is a fair field and no favour; so let the newly-elected take courage, and be bold to do their duty.

ATTEMPTS TO STEAL THE REGALIA.—Mr. S. Leigh Sotheby having courteously pronounced as "an interesting paper" some memoranda and data of mine about the discovery and disappearance of different porth us or the regalia, at various times, I am induced to subjoin what may be considered of some supplemental interest to that communication, namely, an epitome of the examination of Margaret Moore, at the Lambeth Police-office, in 1815, charged with attempting forcibly to remove the King's crown from the Tower. The following is the evidence of the Deputy Keeper of the Regalia, as appears in the original document. 62. A Cameo, white on a dark ground, with the head of the Emperor Commodus.

63. A Double Cameo, forming the centre of the Diadem, which has been left in its original setting, of the cinquecento period, the same as the Cameo to the front, which is a very fine Greek gem, and represents a figure in a chariot with two horses; the execution is almost that of an engraved gem, the artist having produced the beauty of arrangement and colour very rarely to be met with. The cameo on the reverse is emblematical of the river Arno; this side of the gem is cinque cento.

NEW CORN-HALL, EAST DEREHAM.

THE NEW CORN-HALL, AT EAST DEREHAM, NORFOLK.

OWING the example of other towns in the extensive agricultural y of Norfolk, the inhabitants of Dereham have just erected a Hall e accommodation of the farmers and merchants who frequent its y market. The building is of elegant design, and in its arrange- for comfort, convenience, and general effect is at once a credit projectors, and indicates the public spirit of the town and dis stylo of architecture adopted in this new Corn-Hall is Roman.

The east or principal front is composed of a colonnade of Corinthian columns, with a heavy projecting cornice, and surmounted by pilasters and cornice of the same order. The space forming the entrance lobby is inclosed by a pair of ornamental iron gates, and covered by an arch, which, while it forms a feature of the front, is also used to carry the appropriate base and statue of the late Earl of Leicester. The columns, pilasters, and archivalts are of Ancaster stone. The panels are of red brick. The internal dimensions of the Hall are eighty feet by fifty feet, and twenty-seven feet in height from the floor line to the glass ceiling. The whole area of the room is covered in by a wrought-iron roof in one span, with semicircular ribs and principals, which, although peculiarly light in appearance, are of great strength. The outside of the roof is covered with Hartley's patent rough plate-glass. An enriched panelled ceiling of obscured glass, of which the ribs are formed of the tie-beams, will in summer prevent the direct action of the sun's rays into the room, and will also adapt the Hall for a concert, ball, or lecture-room. The floor is of very hard and beautiful wood, and raised by a flight of stone steps from the front, this, with the natural fall of the ground at the west-end, gives sufficient depth to allow of excellent and convenient cellars.

The Hall will hold at least sixty merchants' stands, of which there are already fifty. They are of an original form and construction being semicircular, on a plan which gives increased space for the merchants without curtailing the size of the room. These stands are nearly all occupied, and the attendance of the farmers and others is large.

Messrs. Gogge, of Swaffham, were the architects, and Mr. Hubbard, of Durham, the builder, of this new Hall. The former has exhibited much taste, and the latter performed his work efficiently and to the full satisfaction of all interested in the success of the undertaking.

A company has been formed, principally of the inhabitants of the town and neighbourhood, including agriculturists of the neighbourhood, who, with a capital of £5000, have purchased a block of unsightly old buildings and some land, in a convenient part of the market-place, to complete this handsome Corn Hall.

Foremost among the promoters of this spirited public improvement Mr. Gidney is entitled to honourable mention.

THE VULCANITE COURT AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE founders of the Crystal Palace are entitled to high praise for the artistic idea of placing that which is both interesting and capable of classification in a series of courts. An important addition to their number has lately been contributed by Mr. Goodyear, the discoverer of the vulcanization of indiarubber, who has constructed the "Vulcanite Court," the façade of which is engraved upon the preceding page. It is placed in the South Transept Gallery, upon the Terrace side; and whoever is anxious to obtain any just idea of the rapid progress of invention in that which relates to indiarubber, or its appliances, should witness what is here exhibited, more particularly if the desire is to have any conception of the present and future results of the discovery of the vulcanisation of indiarubber, and the apparently endless uses to which this material is already, and may be hereafter, applied. When the Vulcanite Court was yet unfinished and unfurnished, we alluded to the wide-spread benefits it was destined to confer upon the public. Already, so far as civilisation extends, there is hardly a nook so obscure, or a perspective so dark as not to have been in some degree benefited by it; and few who do not know something of the merits of one of almost the necessaries of life—the American indiarubber galoshe, one of the first articles to which the discovery was applied. The same remark is applicable to a vast number of other articles of vulcanised and vulcanite indiarubber. It needs but a glance for the visitor to discover that a far more extensive industry is now opened with this new material, vulcanite, which has grown out of only another phase of vulcanisation. This will not appear so strange to our readers who have not seen these displays if they consider that in this material there is found a substitute for ivory, whalebone, horn, and shell—possessing their valuable qualities without their defects, such as splitting, altering by change of temperature, waste in working, and expensiveness of carving, turning, &c.; when also they consider that these articles are worked without waste of material, and moulded in a soft state with all the facility of wax or dough.

It would occupy considerable space to detail the hundreds of articles exhibited, which, from the now well-known properties of this material, are proved to be unquestionably superior to the same articles heretofore made of ivory, buckhorn, bone, &c. We therefore pass to a brief description of the Court and the main features of the invention.

The Vulcanite Court is about sixty feet in length by eighteen feet in breadth. It is built for the most part, more particularly such portions as are the most ornamental and striking, of the vulcanite, the columns being inlaid in different colours of workmanship, and the signs, lettering, &c., being of the same material. The interior is divided into three compartments—drawing-room, bed-room, and dining-room. The are filled with exquisite works of ornament and utility. The drawing-room is elegantly furnished with all the articles usually found in the most fashionable mansions, added to which there are numbers of others of interest, and entirely new. The jewellery and carving and the entire requirements of both the gentleman's and lady's toilet are unexceptionable. The walls are decorated with choice engravings, worked upon vulcanite parchment; and the painting-materials and drawing-books are evidently from the hands of accomplished masters and are framed in polished or gilded vulcanite frames. In a word, everything that the accomplished resident might require is here found in its place; and while the tout ensemble is made simply to represent an elegant suite of apartments, the reflective mind cannot but view it as a complete volume in which are legibly written the proof that the ruling are unexceptionable. And what an admirable foil to this is the fiendish grin of Mephistopheles! The background, with the old Leipsic buildings, is happily conceived. Indeed drawing, light and shade, colour, style—all are most masterly.

Mr. Topham has this year, by his increased fidelity to unsophisticated nature, made an advance which will render him a still greater favourite with the public. His faces are less idealised and generalised, and we forget the artist more in his works. "A Zouave's Story of the War" (26), for instance, is full of character, and is besides admirably composed. The fiery Zouave has returned to his native Brittany, and is relating to eagerly-listening family and friends, with an enthusiasm finely conveyed in his expression and the clutch of his right hand, some incident in the war in which he was evidently personally engaged. The same truthfulness is observable in his "Village Musicians—Brittany" (244).

It is a fashionable theory just now that there is a great deal of the wandering "vagabond" element in the artistic temperament. If so, Mr. Bailey, judging from his sympathies, must be largely endowed with that temperament, for nearly all his pictures represent Italian organ-boys or gipsy-girls. However this may be, the painter's works are artistic in treatment, whatever his temperament; witness that bright smile joined to the earnest entreaty conveyed in the words "Ah! Signora" (170) of that vagrant (in spite of beadsdom) hurdygurdy player. The other specimens of the same class are nearly as good. No. 227, though an entirely different subject, is pleasing and pretty, and No. 258, with the somewhat affected title of "Les Regrets," simple and natural

Mr Gilbert, in "The Duchess Reading 'Don Quixote'" (86), gives us an excellent specimen of his dashing bravura execution. The boldness with which opaque and transparent colours are applied almost indiscriminately will make less clever men stand aghast. The artist did not, of course, aim at conveying extreme subtlety of expression into the face as Leslie would have done, but what he did aim at he has achieved most successfully—viz, painting a pleasing lady with sufficient Spanish character, dressed in black (nicely set off by the dull red background), with some rich carving, &c., the whole forming a picturesque and masterly painting.

Mr. W. Goodall has made progress this year. There is less strain after prettiness, and he is altogether more original. The little boy weeping and dragging his satchel unwillingly after him in "Going to School" (8) is capital; and in "Caught by the Tide" (150) its vigorous action and its realisation of the scene show much dramatic power.

Mr Riviere, also, has made progress but from the opposite direction. That is to say his faces are more agreeable and natural. Nos. 38 and 104 by this artist, are both excellent.

Mr. Joseph Nash, in all his pictures, is romantic and picturesque, and devoted to the times of "cavalier and dame." His painting is remarkably solid and rich in effect, and finished in execution. A capital specimen of his style is "A Summer Afternoon's Diversion on the Terrace, Fernshill, Hants" (No. 186). The diversion consists in pairs of cavaliers successively fencing in shirt-sleeves, while other parties of both ladies and gentlemen lazily look on from different parts of the terrace.

Mr. Alfred Fripp, like Mr. Haag, has brought from Rome several excellent subjects, evidently painted on the spot.

The works of Miss Gillies with great merit, yet tend to overelaboration. The faces are worked up till the local flesh colour is lost, and till it becomes much too heavy in tone.

The great charm of the numerous excellent landscapes always found in this Exhibition would have claimed our consideration first, but that there is so remarkable an improvement in the figure department that we gave it the precedence which its superior difficulty claims. We shall return to the landscapes next week.

EXHIBITION OF THE NEW SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

THIS Exhibition opened, with that of the original society, on Monday week. The salient feature observable in this year's display is a marked improvement in the choice of subject. The commonplace and hackneyed themes generally chosen by English artists have render a change of this kind highly desirable. The absence of any restriction to his choice or fetters to his free will, such as the religious requirements of the Church threw around the old masters, should be esteemed by the modern artist as his noblest birthright, and ought to incite him to aim at the elevation and extension of the moral and intellectual influence of his art. There is no reason why an exhibition of pictures should not be as instructive as amusing, and an unrivalled means of improving time as well as of passing it. An artist may do this also by stooping. An economical stove is a good example of this is afforded by Mr. Wehnert in "A New Pupil for John Pounds." As, however, we purpose engraving this picture we shall have another opportunity of illustrating our meaning. Besides Mr. Wehnert, other artists show, as will be seen in our notice, the same effort at originality in different directions.

Mr. Corbould, in variety of "gifts and graces," is, we think, entitled to rank in this branch of art first among his compeers. His drawing is correct, firm, and bold; his finish is obtained by a most dexterous style of hatching; and his colour is variegated, yet harmonious—rich in hue, and intense in tone. In respect of subject his mind appears to be one vast storehouse of the most picturesque and romantic materials, which his ready, lively fancy can arrange and combine in admirable and varied ways for effect. His principal work exhibited this year proves, moreover, that he is almost as original in observation of every-day fact as he is in the flights of his poetical fancy. The subject of his picture, Scene at a Prisoner Fair—the Birthday of the King, Frederick William IV." (62). Our space will not permit an attempt at describing the motley and diver-sified groups assembled at the fair. Suffice it to say that the local and national characteristics some of which are very humorous, are faithfully preserved; and, though with less satire, and less powerful suggestiveness of mind and movement, it almost equals in inventive confusion Hogarth's "Southwark Fair," and his "March to Finchley." We may venture to hint, however, that a greater breadth and space of light thrown on some part of the picture would have increased its wonderful powers of local effect. "The Fatal Meeting" (8) from Rogers's "Italy," representing the revelation of Imelda to Paolo, is in Mr. Corbould's better-known style; the costumes and trappings are exceedingly rich. The fun and agacerie in the two clever pictures, "Who is it?" (316), and its companion and sequel, "Murder Found" (321) are very charming.

Mr. Louis Haghe is picturesque and rich in effect as ever, and, without the daintiness of handling, the fancy and refinement of colour, of Mr. Corbould, is rather more vigorous and masculine and has also great original color- artistic resources and appliances. His large work No. 71 is commended by its well-chosen subject. We read in A Midsummer Night's Dream that Edward Helpadrake that "Towards the end of the sixteenth century, the painter Cornelius de Vroom embarked for Spain with several of his pictures on board in the hope of disposing of them there. While carrying the Spanish coast the vessel was wrecked, but Vroom and the crew were enabled to reach a rock near the coast of Portugal. Parts of the wreck, with the works of Vroom, were driven on shore, and found by some monks whose convent was near the spot." The collecting of the monks in their cloisters to unpack and examine the pictures is the incident represented. There is much accident in the disposition of the monks, yet they seem many of them merely "posed," and somewhat lacking vitality. The light pouring through the low wide arch gives great breadth, and, at the same time, admirably relieves the group of monks. To complete the story—the monks concluded from these works that the crew of the unfortunate vessel must have been Christians, and not Moorish pirates; and thereupon sent a boat, which found and saved them. We may add also that Vroom found his way to Lisbon; and there he was engaged to paint the tempest he had witnessed, and succeeded so well that he afterwards applied himself entirely to painting sea-pieces and storms. Mr Haghe's next picture is very truthful in effect, and full of local character. It represents a public "Letter-writer at Rome" (97), in one of the arches of the lower story (or rather a portion of the arch, for they are half-buried in the street) of what was once the immense theatre built by Augustus, and dedicated to the young Marcellus. Of the noble portico Augustus added, and to which he gave the name of his sister Octavia, Mr. Haghe has also given us the remains in No. 196.

A large and remarkable picture by Mr. Henry Warren (the President of the Society) represents "A Street in Cairo, with a Marriage Procession" (218). The whole work has that Oriental evanescence for which this artist is well known—particularly for his rendering of the atmospheric phenomena of Eastern countries. Here, however, we may venture a remark which appears to us to apply to this fine performance. It will be observed that the whole of the narrow street, filled by the procession, is flooded, or rather suffused and permeated, with light, as if the rays proceeded from all directions—for a cast shadow is scarcely perceptible thrown at any angle. Now, without wishing to represent Mr. Warren as the "shadowless man," we know that in our own climate, and in all the west of Europe, the more brilliant the light the more cutting and decided the shadow. And in respect to the East, recent authorities, such as Hunt, Lewis, and Seddon authorities which travellers assure us should supersede all others—tell us that this effect is still more observable where the atmosphere is so much thinner. In Mr. Warren's picture we admit that the sun's rays are not actually represented, that the atmosphere being confined may be much more dense, and that there will be a great deal of reflected light from the white dresses; still we suspect that, for the sake of breadth, which is evidently aimed at by the introduction of the dark sides of the shop, which force this effect, there is a slight departure from nature in this diffusion of light.

"The Mermaiden's Well" (206), from Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor," proves Mr. Absolon has made a great advance in his figure-painting. We shall, however, engrave this work, and therefore have another opportunity of referring to it. There is a nameless charm and grace in "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow" (156). We might imagine the Vicar of Wakefield in the pulpit, and we think we could pick out his daughters. A "Peat Field, near Capel Arthog, North Wales" (92), even without the figures would be delightful. It is so clear, fresh, and bright. You might almost fancy you sniff the fragrant air. Its pure and unmuddled washes of floating colour contribute to this effect. But his very facility has tempted the artist to leave his work rather unfinished. Still there is no doubt that these flat washes show the true and proper capabilities of water-colour—its gaiety, its freshness its luminous power, and its pearly lights—more than any other method of manipulation.

Mr. Kearney, in "Love's Young Dream—an Incident in the Early Career of Van Dyke" (41), has, besides the colouring feeling, higher technical qualities, such as depth and richness of tone and unity of effect. The faces are, however, somewhat slighted.

We have to charge Mr. Mole with a little of this disregard of the face, but he may justly plead that his subjects are more simple and unambitious. Apart from this few artists are more versatile, for the general effect of his figures and their landscape background or rather accompaniments, for we scarcely know which is entitled to the most consideration—are equally meritorious. No. 249 is a good example of this artist, and we have the artist's permission to engrave No. 124.

"A Secret" (140), one little girl whispering another, by Miss Farmer, is beautiful in its pearly flesh tints, and has charming vivacity of light and expression. The sunniness of another picture (No. 289) by this lady fairly entitled it to a better place.

Mr. Lee gives us some honest, sturdy, tanned, and healthy country-folk. Here are no milkmaids from the drawing-room, nor rustics from the ballet. The brawny arms of that chubby milkmaid in "The Sudden Thought" (67) would be formidable to some of us Londoners of the sterner sex, were not her smile, though sly, full of good nature. No. 107 is equally natural.

"La Belle Jardinière" (32) is the best painting by Mr. Bonvier, and would figure well on a Sèvres vase. The stipple and softening off of the flesh is out of keeping with the more forcible treatment of the rest of the. The bright tone of the upper part is, however, very pleasing, and the face undeniably pretty, though insipid. By-the-by, where is Miss Setchell?—it is becoming a "Momentous Question."

The landscapes, &c., in this Exhibition we reserve the consideration of till next week.

ROYAL INSTITUTION.—On Friday evening (last week) Captain John Grant made some observations on the application of heat to domestic purposes, and explained the plans recently contrived by himself for the application of heat to Military Cookery. The first portion of his subject was very briefly treated. Captain Grant exhibited a model of an open stove extensively used in Brittany, which projects from the fireplace, radiates heat from its sides and top, at the same time that it possesses the English requisite of presenting a cheerful looking fire. The stove has also the important advantage of preserving the chimney from smoking. An economical stove for the poor class of dwellings was exhibited, in which there is an arrangement for baking, boiling, and roasting. In one of a small fire inclosed in iron plates, the heat from which is carried by a flue round the top of the oven, instead of the bottom as usual; and by the introduction of a thick tile the heat is communicated to the bottom. The economical application of heat to military cookery was illustrated by several models of cooking apparatus, contrived by Capt. Grant, which have been practically applied with great advantage at Aldershott. The plan, in its rude form, as adapted for campaigning, is to dig a small trench about a foot wide, at one end of which a chimney may be constructed of sods of turf piled one upon another, with a hole in the centre. On the top of the trench iron plates are placed with holes, into which camp-kettles will fit, and the fire is lighted in the trench. By the top of which being covered by the camp kettles, there is a good draught established through the chimney. By this contrivance a number of camp kettles may be advantageously heated with a small consumption of fuel. At Aldershott this model principle is carried out in a more finished manner. There is a brick-work trench and moveable grid-bars and an ash-pit; and a well-constructed chimney of brick-work raises the draught to a sufficient height. Iron plates, with conically melted like lead. Captain Grant said that, with the cooking apparatus of three hundred men have been cooked with an expenditure of fuel of only half a pound to a man. By a recent contrivance, the kettles also been effected by placing them in the upper compartment of the chimney. And the most remarkable feature in Captain Grant's portable cooking cart-in, by means of which, with the aid of a small quantity of fuel, a sufficient quantity of meat and vegetables may be cooked in half an hour

THE SPEAKER AND THE SPEAKERSHIP.

SINCE the year 1760, when Mr. Arthur Onslow resigned the Speakership which he had filled during the entire reign of King George II., in five successive Parliaments, embracing the unparalleled period of thirty-three years, down to the resignation of Mr. Shaw Lefevre, less than ten Speakers in succession have filled the chair of the House of Commons, all of whom, with the single exception of Mr. Cornewall, have been rewarded for their services with a Peerage. It will be seen by this, as there have been ten Speakers in the century, the average tenure of office has been as nearly as possible ten years apiece. The list is as follows—

1. Sir John Cust, M.P. for Grantham, elected in 1761, on the opening of the first Parliament of King George III., and reëlected in 1768. He resigned, on the ground of ill health, Jan. 17, 1770, and was rewarded with the dignity of Brownlow, which was conferred upon his eldest son in 1776.

2. Sir Fletcher Norton, Bart., M.P. for Guildford, chosen Jan. 31, 1770, and reëlected in the Parliament of 1774. He retired in 1780, and soon after was created Lord Grantley

3. Mr. Charles Wolfran Cornewall, M.P. for Winchelsea, elected on the assembling of the new Parliament in 1780, and reëlected in 1784, when he sat as member for Rye. He died during his tenure of the Speakership [illegible] 1789.

4. Mr. William Windham Grenville (afterwards Lord Grenville), M.P. for Buckinghamshire. He was elected on Mr. Cornewall's death, Jan. [illegible] and resigned his Speakership in the following June.

5. The Right Hon. Charles Abbot, M.P. for Devizes was elected Speaker [illegible] and was reëlected in the Parliaments of 1802 and 1806. In January, 1801, Mr. Addington, who succeeded Mr. Speaker [illegible] the Act [illegible] the Union of the English and Irish Parliaments, was [illegible] the Premiership. Mr. Addington was [illegible] the Chancellorship of the Exchequer, and the Speaker was [illegible] Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer. He was not [illegible] elevated to the Peerage as Viscount Sidmouth until the year 1805.

6. Sir John Mitford, M.P. for Beeralston, elected Feb. 11, 1801; resigned Feb. 9, 1802, on being made Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and raised to the Barony of Redesdale.

7. The Right Hon. Charles Abbot, M.P. for Helstone, elected Feb. 10, 1802, and reëlected by a new Parliament in the following November; as also again in 1806, 1807, and 1812. He retired in June, 1817, having held the Speakership fifteen years, and was created Lord Colchester.

8. The Right Hon. Charles Manners Sutton (then M.P. for Scarborough, but afterwards member for the University of Cambridge), was elected Speaker in June, 1817, and reëlected on five other different occasions—viz., in 1819, 1820, 1826, 1830, 1831, and 1837. He was proposed a seventh time in Feb. 1835, but defeated by his successor, and soon afterwards elevated to the Viscounty of Canterbury, of which see his father was formerly Archbishop.

9. The Right Hon. James Abercromby, M.P. for Edinburgh, elected Feb. 19, 1835. In this contest Mr. Abercromby had 316 votes, Sir Charles Manners Sutton recording 306. It is stated that on this occasion the House of Commons presented the largest assemblage of members that was ever drawn together, no less than 628 having voted in the division lists, besides several members who left the House without recording their sentiments. Mr. Abercromby was re elected in 1837, but resigned, on the plea of ill health, in May, 1839, when he was rewarded with the Barony of Dunfermline.

10. The late Speaker, the Right Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre, M.P. for North Hants, elected May 27, 1839, in opposition to the late Right Hon. Henry Goulburn; again chosen, without a contest, in 1841, 1847, and 1852; and elevated to the Peerage as Viscount Eversley on his resignation in March, 1857.

From the above statistics it will be seen that the late Speaker's tenure of office, which was within two months of eighteen years, has exceeded in duration that of every other Speaker in the last century, being about three months longer than that of the late Sir Charles Manners Sutton. Our readers may possibly remember a statement made in 1832 by Sir Robert Harry Inglis, in proposing the re-election of the right hon. gentleman, to the effect that, up to that date, Mr. Shaw Lefevre had sat in the chair no less than thirteen hundred times in the discharge of his official duties since his first election in 1839.

We may be forgiven for adding at the present moment the following extract from Townsend's "History of the Commons," in reference to the subject on which we are speaking:—"With the Revolution commenced the real importance of the Speaker of the Lower House in rank, character, and consideration. From that auspicious era he has taken his proper station in the British Constitution. Ever since the statute I William and Mary, cap. 21, he has taken his place next to the Peers of Great Britain, both in and out of Parliament; he is always so named in all public documents and commissions, and he has this precedence at her Majesty's council-table. To secure his perfect independence of party he ceased, at the beginning of King George III.'s reign, to hold any office under the Crown; Mr. Speaker Onslow setting the example, to which his successors have always since adhered. His strict impartiality, and his acquaintance with Parliamentary precedents, have been secured by an almost fixed tenure of office, and his arduous duties have almost invariably been rewarded with a coronet at the close of a long service.[1] The following summary of the office and duty of the Speaker is taken from Haydn's invaluable "Manual of Dignities:—"This great and independent officer is chosen by the House of Commons from among its own members, subject to the approval of the Sovereign, and holds his office until the dissolution of the Parliament by which he was elected. As Chairman of the House, his duties are the same as those of any other President of a deliberative assembly. He is always a member of the Privy Council, and is entitled to rank immediately after Barons, and before the Commissioners of the Great Seal. Generally speaking, the business of the House cannot be transacted in the absence of the Speaker; although to this rule there was an exception in the case when, during the illness of a Speaker, a prisoner was released from the custody of the House. He reads to the Sovereign the occasional petitions and addresses of the Commons, and, as their organ, makes such speeches as are usual or necessary on their behalf. He manages the House when prisoners, witnesses, or counsel are summoned to its bar, reprimands persons who have incurred the censure or displeasure of the House, issues warrants of committal for breaches of privilege, and expresses the thanks or approbation of the Commons to such personages as have been voted this high and most honourable distinction by the House. When Parliament is about to be prorogued it is customary for the Speaker to address the Sovereign at the bar of the House of Lords, in a speech recapitulating the leading business and proceedings of the Session." The Speaker has the casting vote upon divisions in which the votes prove equal, except when the House is in Committee. On such occasions the Speaker leaves the chair, which is occupied by another member, called the Chairman of Committee, who holds his appointment from Session to Session. In Committee the Speaker ceases to hold his official position, and becomes a private member; and accordingly he is at liberty to join in the discussion which may happen to be going on—a license which he does not enjoy when seated in the chair of the House; so that the name of "Speaker" has frequently been alluded to as an admirable instance of the lucus a non lucendo.

Mr. Evelyn Denison was elected Speaker the other day without opposition. Had a contest, however, arisen he would have adhered to the ancient courtesy always practised on such occasions by voting for his rival. Thus Sir C. Manners Sutton, in [illegible] Mr. Goulburn, and, in May, 1839, Mr Shaw Lefevre registered his vote in favour of [illegible] Right Hon. Henry Goulburn.

NEW PALACE OF WESTMINSTER.

THE DIVISION LOBBY OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THIS apartment, if we may so term it, for it is fitted up with settees and chairs, runs the whole length of the [illegible] House of Commons, and forms an ante-room, with a corresponding one [illegible] on the opposite side of the House. The [illegible] is lighted by four windows of three lights each, the glass being [illegible] called with the arms of the [illegible] The upper [illegible] is richly emblazoned with a regal badge surmounted by a [illegible] the lower divisions of the windows with two (red and white) [illegible] above the other, the dispersing before mentioned surrounding [illegible] In the centre of this lobby is an oriel, or bay, of five sides, lighted by five windows, each filled with stained glass in the same [illegible] four just mentioned. In this bay is placed [illegible] corresponding [illegible] and chairs. The ceiling is of [illegible] panelled, corresponding with the ceiling of the lobby, which is richly pierced in the bands which form the compartments the pierced work acts as a ventilator; the sides of the walls are panelled in oak, with the napkin pattern carved in each panel. The fireplaces, of which there are two, are of [illegible] carved with the [illegible] and the background being coloured blue: the [illegible] and Ireland are placed in three [illegible] small shields on the top, and are emblazoned, the inner panel [illegible] fireplace is filled with encaustic tiles, richly coloured. From this lobby the members can reach the upper seats at either end, without entering the principal doors by a small staircase situated in the corner. In this lobby the members are wont to relieve themselves by a pleasant chat and a lounge during the monotony of a sitting. And it is through this they pass from the House to the Corridor, situated at the end, a view of which is also given.

THE CORRIDOR OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

This apartment resembles in detail the Division Lobby just described, but, on entering, [illegible] has a more [illegible] which [illegible] the other when looking from it, on account of the [illegible] panelled walls, only [illegible] by [illegible] gaseliers for lighting it. This wretched work has been added by the ventilators to the House, at the expense of beauty. The oriel has [illegible] like the lobby, and has a table and chairs for the use of the members. From this Corridor access is gained to the Strangers' and Reporters' Galleries. Here also, the votes are taken by the teller, at a bar placed across the opening from the Corridor to the Lobby—the members passing between this barrier and a desk placed [illegible] teller.

[1] On this occasion he was opposed by Mr. E. J. Littleton, now Lord Hatherton

[1] We believe that it has been necessary to add to the coronet a pension, not only to the ex-Speaker, but to his successors in the title to two generations. In the instance of Lord Eversley, the latter part of the precedent will be broken through, inasmuch as his Lordship has no son to succeed him

[1] In the Session of 1855 it was found necessary to make a provision for this event; and, accordingly, during a few days while the late Speaker was absent through ill health, the chair was taken by the Right Hon. Henry FitzRoy

LIST OF PLACES REPRESENTED, AND THE NAMES OF THE MEMBERS OF THE NEW HOUSE OF COMMONS.

ENGLISH AND WELSH COUNTIES AND BOROUGHS.

ABINGDON, Berkshire, has returned one member to Parliament since 1558. In Saxon times, as the "Abbey-town," it was a place of great importance, and its mitred Abbot was a Lord of Parliament. It is celebrated as the birthplace of St. Edmund. At the time of the Reform Bill the constituency underwent a change, the franchise being transferred from the old scot and lot inhabitants to the £10 householders. The latter then numbered some 460 individuals, but by the recent returns they would seem to have decreased to 312. The entire population of the town is now given at 8854. John Russell's Reform Bill of 1853 proposed to join the town of Faringdon to the borough of Abingdon, on account of the smallness of its constituency. The borough was represented for eleven years after the passing of the Reform Bill by the late Mr. T. Duffield, who ran off with the great heiress, Miss Elwes, the miser's daughter. On his retirement, in 1844, he was succeeded by Sir F. Thesiger, Lord Derby's Attorney-General. Major Reed, the late member, at the recent election was an unsuccessful candidate for Finsbury. In his place we have returned

MR. JOHN THOMAS NORRIS, a paper-maker, of Sutton Courtney, near Abingdon, and a Common Councilman of London, and recently elected a Director of the Eastern Counties Railway. He is a Moderate Liberal, and will give Lord Palmerston "an independent support," more especially in domestic and social reforms. He is understood to be in favour of national education, the admission of Jews into Parliament, and the withdrawal of the Maynooth grant: is opposed to the ballot.

ANDOVER, Hants, lies on the edge of Salisbury Plain, and returned burgesses as far back as 1295. Twelve years afterwards, however, it ceased to do so, and it was not until 1832 that it began to send them regularly. The old constituency before the Reform Act consisted of the Bailiff and a select number of burgesses; since that time the franchise has been extended to the £10 householders of the borough and surrounding district, who in 1832 were 322 in number, but have since dwindled down to little more than 200. The registered electors in 1852 were only 241; the population in 1851 was 6355. Lord John Russell's Reform Bill of 1852 proposed to add to Andover the towns of Basingstoke, Stockbridge, and Whitchurch. The families of Sir John Pollen and the Earl of Portsmouth are said to be the chief influences here, but it is much diminished since the Reform Act. For the last twenty-five years the borough has been represented by Sir J. W. Pollen, Mr. Etwall, and Lord W. Paget; and in the last Parliament it returned Mr. H. B. Coles and Mr. Cubitt. The members now returned are

1. MR. WILLIAM CUBITT, Alderman and late Sheriff of London, and an eminent builder and contractor. He is a native of Norfolk, and has risen to opulence by his energy and honest industry. He is a Liberal, and professes to be in favour of Free-trade and moderate reform, and of the repeal of the Malt-tax, and a supporter of "Church and State."

2. The HON. DUDLEY FORTESCUE, a younger son of Earl Fortescue and brother of Viscount Ebrington, M.P., and brother-in law of the Earl of Portsmouth. He is an "independent supporter" of Lord Palmerston, and in favour of electoral reform and the abolition of Church-rates.

ANGLESEA.—The Isle of Anglesea has returned a member since 1536. The chief landowner is the Marquis of Anglesey, whose influence was paramount down to the passing of the Reform Act, but it is now divided pretty equally with the Bulkeley family. The population is mostly engaged in agriculture and mining operations: in 1852 it was 48,333, but at the Census of 1851 it had increased to 50,066. The franchise in Act it has been represented alternately by Sir R. W. Bulkeley and the Hon. W. O. Stanley. The present member is

SIR RICHARD WILLIAM BULKELEY, Bart., of Baron's Hill, Beaumaris, Lord Lieutenant of Carnarvonshire, who is a general supporter of Lord Palmerston, but does not frequently record his vote in the House.

ARUNDEL, a small town on the river Arun, in Sussex, derives such importance as it possesses from the ancient Castle under the walls of which it stands; and is the chief borough of the Duke of Norfolk. It sent two members to Parliament from 1295 to the Reform Bill, when it was placed in Schedule B. Its constituency originally was composed of the inhabitants paying scot and lot, but was then extended to the £10 householders, which, in 1832, were 380, but are now given as only 172 Lord J. Russell's Reform Bill of 1852 proposed to add the parishes of Bognor, Leominster, Little Hampton, Cuckfield, and Petworth. The population are almost all engaged in the timber and shipping trade. Like most other close boroughs, it has returned a fair sprinkling of great men, among whom may be mentioned Charles, Earl of Orrery (inventor of the "Orrery;" and Lachian Maclean, one of the many reputed authors of "Junius' Letters." The late Lord Dudley Coutts Stuart, the friend of the exiled Poles, sat for the borough from 1832 to 1837; and the present Duke of Norfolk, then Lord Fitzalan, was returned in his place. He retired in 1841, and made way for Mr. E. Strutt, now Lord Belper. The present member is LORD EDWARD GEORGE HOWARD, the Duke's next brother, who has sat for the borough since 1852, having previously represented Horsham. He is the only Roman Catholic member returned to Parliament by any constituency in Great Britain; and is a steady supporter of Lord Palmerston's Government, excepting in matters where he feels that the interests of his religion are at stake. He voted against Mr. Cobden's motion on China.

ASHBURTON, a borough situated in the south of Devon, on the river Dart, returned two members from 1640 to 1832, when it was placed in Schedule B. Its constituency was formerly composed of the free holders, &c., having lands or tenements subject to a borough rent, but is now extended so as to include all £10 householders. The old constituency numbered 342; but, in 1847, had decreased to 274. Ashburton is situated in the neighbourhood of a mining district, and its population is chiefly engaged in mining operations. Among its former representatives it counts Lord Lyndhurst, who sat for it in the Parliaments of 1818 and 1820, and the Right Hon. W. Sturges Bourne. Since 1832 it has been represented by Mr. Poyntz, Mr. C. Lushington (the great advocate for repeal of Churchrates), Mr. Jardine, Sir J. Matheson, and his brother, Mr. Thos. Matheson. Its present member is

MR. GEORGE MOFFATT, a London merchant, who has sat since 1852. He is opposed to Church-rates, and in favour of a large extension of the franchise and vote by ballot. He supported Lord Palmerston on the China question.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE is an important manufacturing town in Lancashire, about six miles from Manchester, and lies in the vicinity of a coal district. It was created a borough under the Reform Act of 1832, its constituency being the £10 householders residing within the limits of a local Act (7 and 8 Geo IV.). In 1832 these were only 610, but, in 1847, had nearly doubled in number, as had also the population, which has risen from 14,673 to nearly 30,000 in 1851. The population are chiefly engaged in the manufactures of cotton and calico. Its first member was a Col Williams, who was succeeded in the representation, in Dec., 1834, by its present member,

MR. CHARLES HINDLEY, a supporter of extensive reforms the ballot, civil and religious equality, and the abolition of Church-rates. He was absent from the division on the China question.

AYLESBURY, Buckinghamshire, has returned two members since 1623. The constituency was formerly composed of a Mayor, nine Aldermen, and twelve burgesses, but became extinct in 1835, when the manor of Aylesbury succeeded them; and in turn were superseded by the "potwallopers" of the borough, not in receipt of alms. The borough being convicted of gross bribery in 1694, the forty-shilling freeholders of the adjoining hundreds were added to the constituency; and to these, in 1832, were added the £10 householders. At that date the registered electors were 1654; but at the date of the last return they were only 1417. The patronage of the borough was once vested in the hands of the Duke of Buckingham; but his Grace's influence is now nearly extinct. The inhabitants of Aylesbury are engaged in straw-plaiting, and the town is the centre of a large agricultural district. The entire population of the borough and its surrounding hundreds in 1851 was above 25,000. Aylesbury has been represented by one of the most distinguished persons of its adjoining hundreds were added to the constituency; and to these, in among others by John Wilkes, who was expelled the House in 1764, and by Lord Lake, the well-known Indian General. The Reform Act did not alter the number of members for Aylesbury; but at the time among those who have sat for Aylesbury are Winthrop Mackworth Praed, the Etonian poet and orator, Lord Nugent, the honest advocate of the ballot, and Mr. Layard, of Eastern celebrity, who was rejected at the recent election. Its present members are

1. SIR RICHARD BETHELL, late Solicitor, and now Attorney, General, the eminent leader of the Chancery Bar, whose politics, of course, are the same with that of the Government of which he is a member, and

2. MR. T. BERNARD, next brother of Sir F. Bernard-Morland, a Liberal Conservative, who professes himself favourable to the admission of Jews into Parliament, but opposed to the ballot and the abolition of Church-rates without an equivalent.

BANBURY, Oxfordshire, has returned one member since 1553. Its former constituency were the eighteen members of the old Corporation, to which were added in 1832 the £10 householders, who then, as now, numbered a little less than 280. The registered electors, who at the passing of the Reform Act were 239, had risen in 1852 to 491. By Lord John Russell's Reform Bill of 1852 it was proposed to increase the constituency by joining to the borough the parish of Chipping Norton. The population is partly agricultural and partly engaged in manufacture, and the Baroness North still possesses some slight influence. Banbury numbers among its former members Frederick, Lord North, who was Premier under George III. Since 1832 it has been represented by its present member.

MR. HENRY WILLIAM TANCRED, a barrister-at-law, who, while he advocates the ballot, short Parliaments, and a largely-extended franchise, has recently declared that he will "support any Ministry that will upho'd the true interests of the people."

BARNSTAPLE, Devonshire, is situated at the mouth of the river Taw, and was one of the old Saxon boroughs in the time of King Athelstane. It has returned two members since 1296, and was not affected by the Reform Act. Its constituency, which till then was composed of the Corporation and 400 freemen, was extended to the £10 householders. Its number, which was given in 1851 at 11,371, is mostly engaged in the shipping trade and woollen manufactures. The borough numbers among its former representatives Lord Exmouth and Sir Eyre Coote. Since the Reform Act it has been represented by Sir Bruce Chichester, Mr. M. Gore, the Hon. J. W. Fortescue, and several other individuals. Its elections have been more than once the subject of inquiry before Committees. Its present members are

1. SIR WILLIAM FRASER, Bart., a Conservative, formerly in the Life Guards, who was unseated after being returned in 1835; and

2. MR. JOHN LAURIE, also a Conservative, who was first returned, after a suspension of the writ, in 1854, but was unseated in the following March

BATH.—The city of Bath, on the river Avon, county Somerset, and an old Roman station, noted for its baths from which it takes its name, has returned two members since 1295. Its constituency previous to the Reform Act consisted of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Councilmen; but is now extended to the £10 householders of Bath and the adjoining suburbs of Batheaston, Walcot, &c. The chief local influence is divided between the Duke of Cleveland, the Marquis Camden, and the Marquis of Bath. It population in 1851 was 54,240, and its registered electors amounted to 3254. The city has been represented by Lord Ligonier, Lord Chancellor Northington, and the celebrated Earl of Chatham. Since the Reform Act it has returned, among others, General Palmer, son of the inventor of mail coaches; John Arthur Roebuck, and the present Earl of Shaftesbury. Its present members are

1. MR. WILLIAM TITE, the celebrated architect of the Royal Exchange. He has sat for the borough since 1854, and was formerly Vice-President of the Administrative Reform Association. As may be supposed, he is in favour of extensive reforms in the Executive and in the Administration, of national education, extended suffrage, and the ballot. He is opposed to the Maynooth grant, and voted with Mr. Cobden on the China question.

2. SIR ARTHUR HALLAM ELTON, Bart., a nephew of the historian, Henry Hallam. He is newly elected, and, though he admires Lord Palmerston on general grounds, is opposed to his war policy. He is in favour of public economy, extended franchise, the redistribution of electoral districts, and also of the ballot, concerning which he has written a book to prove that it is a "Conservative measure."

BEAUMARIS, the county town of the Isle of Anglesea, returns one member together with some tributary boroughs, which have added to its constituency by the Reform Act. It has become borough however, in 1295, and has returned two members since that time. The Mayor, Bailiffs, and capital burgesses—was extended in 1832 to include the £10 householders, who are about 360 in number. The registered electors, who then were only 238, had risen in 1851 to 316. Its population according to the last Census was 12,252. The borough has been represented since the Reform Act till now by some individual of the Paget family, but the newly-elected member is

THE HON. WILLIAM OWEN STANLEY, next brother of Lord Stanley of Alderley, a general supporter of Lord Palmerston, and of such Liberal measures as Church reform, extension of suffrage, and the ballot. He sat in the last Parliament for Chester

BEDFORD, a borough and the county town of Bedfordshire, has returned two members since 1295. Its constituency prior to the Reform Act comprised the freemen, whether resident or not; but these were extended to the £10 householders. The registered electors in 1832 numbered 1572, but in 1847 had decreased (by the deaths of freemen, &c.) to 919. The population in 1851 was 11,693. Among the chief influences are Sir S. Lake, the hero of "Hudibras," and the well-known Samuel Whitbread, whose family still retains a considerable influence with the Duke of Bedford. Since the Reform Act it has been represented by Mr. W. H. Whitbread, Mr. Crawley, Captain Polhill, Sir Harry Verney, and other individuals. Its present members are

1. MR. SAMUEL WHITBREAD, first elected in 18—, a grandson of the late Earl Grey, and late private secretary to Sir George Grey. He is a thorough supporter of Lord Palmerston, and opposed to the ballot.

2. MR. THOS. BARNARD, a banker in the borough, and a consistent supporter of Lord Palmerston. He is in favour of extensive reform, abolition of Church-rates, and a liberal scheme of education

BEDFORDSHIRE.—This county, which is almost wholly agricultural, has returned two members since 1295, and the Reform Act made no change in its representation. The chief local influence is divided between the Duke, Bedford, De Grey, and Osnaby families. Among former members for Bedfordshire who have a place in history we may mention Wentworth Earl of Strafford, and William Lord Russell. Ever since the Reform Act one seat has been held by a member of the Russell family, the other being occupied for many years by the late Lord Alford. The present members, who have sat since 1852, are

1. MR. FRANCIS CHARLES HASTINGS RUSSELL, a nephew of the Duke of Bedford, who "supports the well-known principles of his family." He voted with the Ministry on Mr. Cobden's motion.

2. COLONEL RICHARD THOMAS GILPIN, one of the Protectionist party of Lord Derby, and a strong supporter of the existing Constitution in Church and State.

BERKSHIRE is an agricultural county, and returned two members from 1295 down to 1832, when a third was added. Its population in 1851 was 169,591, and its constituency is the same as in all other English counties. Among its most notable members in former times are the first Viscount Bolingbroke, John Elwes the miser, the late Mr. John Walter, the founder of the Times newspaper, and the late Mr Philip Pusey, the eminent agriculturist. Its present members are

1. MR. ROBERT PALMER, a Conservative with Liberal tendencies, who has represented the county for many years.

2. MR. GEORGE HENRY VANSITTART, who first came into Parliament in 1852 as a strong supporter of Lord Derby and Protection, and an opponent of the Maynooth grant.

3. The HON. PHILIP PLEYDELL BOUVERIE, a younger brother of the Earl of Radnor, and a banker in Westminster, who has just been elected as supporter of Lord Palmerston's Government, of national education, and extended franchise.

BERWICK-ON-TWEED, situated partly in England and partly in Scotland, and, in some sense, a part of neither country, has returned two members since 1295. Its constituency have now been re-elected as an advocate of extensive reforms, and a general supporter of Lord Palmerston. He is an ex-director of the Royal British Bank.

BEVERLEY.—This borough is in the East Riding of Yorkshire, and has returned two members regularly since the reign of Queen Mary, and occasionally as far back as 1295, and has

BRIDGNORTH, county of Salop, on the Severn, is a trading and agricultural town, which has returned two members since 1295. Its population in 1851 was 7416, and its registered electors 717, showing a slight decrease since the Reform Act, which changed the constituency from the freemen resident and non-resident into the resident freemen and £10 householders. The representation since the Reform Act has been mostly divided between the Pigot and Whitmore families. The present members are—

1. MR. HENRY WHITMORE, a moderate Conservative. He voted against Ministers on the China question.

2. MR. JOHN PRITCHARD, a Liberal Conservative. He is in favour of safe and constitutional reforms, and a national system of education carried out by voluntary exertions. He supported Lord Palmerston on the China debate, and will not withdraw the Maynooth grant.

BRIDPORT, Dorset, on the river Brit, a town celebrated for its rope-factories, has returned two members since 1295. Its old constituency was composed of the inhabitant householders paying scot and lot; but the Reform Act extended it to all £10-householders. Its population in 1851 was 15,668; its registered electors were 524. By Lord John Russell's Reform Bill of 1852, it was proposed to increase the constituency by joining to the borough the parish of Beaminster. Among its noted members were Sir Evan Nepean, Lord Hood, and Lord Wynford. Since the Reform Act the borough has been represented by Mr. H. Warburton, Sir John Romilly now Master of the Rolls, and Mr. Horace Twiss. Its present members are

BRIGHTON, or BRIGHTHELMSTONE, Sussex, has returned two members since the Reform Act. At that time its population was 41,994, in 1841 it had reached 69,673, while the registered electors had risen from 1649 to 3675. Its constituency consists of the £10 householders of Brighton and Hove. The family of the Marquis of Bristol, who resides at Kemp Town, has more influence in the borough; and his son, Lord A. Hervey, sat from 1842 to 1857. The present members are

1. SIR GEORGE RICHARD PECHELL, BART., who has sat since 1832. He is in favour of the ballot, extended suffrage, abolition of Church-rates, and admission of Jews. He opposed Mr. Cobden's motion.

2. MR. WILLIAM CONINGHAM, who formerly contested the borough, as well as Worcester, on various occasions. He now professes himself a supporter of Lord Palmerston. He will vote for the ballot and abolition of Church-rates.

BRISTOL, a city on the Avon, in the counties of Gloucester and Somerset, and a county in itself, has returned two members since 1295. It is largely engaged in the shipping trade, more especially with America. Its constituency was originally composed of the 63s. freeholders and free burgesses, but to these the Reform Act added the £10 householders, uniting them to the existing members. The registered electors in 1832 were 12,758, the population being 137,328. It can count among its noted members Edmund Burke and the celebrated Sir Samuel Romilly. The Berkeley and Fox and Berkeley families, and that of Mr. Miles, of Leigh Court, still have some slight local influence. The present members are

1. MR. FRANCIS HENRY FITZHARDINGE BERKELEY, the well-known advocate of the ballot, and the opponent of all religious disabilities. He supports the Maynooth grant.

2. MR. WILLIAM HENRY GORE-LANGTON, late Mayor of the city. He is a general supporter of Lord Palmerston's Government, for whom he voted on the China question. He is opposed, however, to the Maynooth grant.

BUCKINGHAM, the county town of Bucks, has sent two members since 1542. The Reform Act of 1832 added the £10 householders to the original constituency, which was composed of the Bailiff and twelve burgesses. The registered electors at that time were 300, but had risen in 1852 to 349. The population in 1851 was 8668. By Lord John Russell's Reform Bill of 1852 it was proposed to increase the constituency by joining to the borough the parishes of Newport Pagnell and Stony Stratford. The influence was formerly in the hands of the ducal house of Buckingham, some member of whose family has sat for the borough for upwards of a century and a half. Among its distinguished members while it was a close borough may be mentioned Dr. Radcliffe, founder of the Radcliffe Library at Oxford; George Grenville, Earl Temple, the great Earl of Chatham, Lord Grenville, Lord Bridport, and the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville. Since the Reform Bill it has been mainly represented by Sir T. Fremantle, Sir John Chetwode, the Marquis of Chandos, and by its present members.

1. GENERAL HALL, a strong Tory of the old school, who has sat since 1846: he is opposed to the Maynooth grant and the admission of Jews. He voted on Mr. Cobden's motion on China.

2. SIR HARRY VERNEY, BART., a Liberal, and a zealous supporter of Lord Palmerston. He was first chosen in 1841, and represented the county of Bedford. He was re-elected after the recent dissolution. He is in favour of national education based on religion. When formerly in Parliament he took an active part in passing the Municipal Corporation Act, the commutation of tithes, penny postage, and Free-trade measure

BUCKINGHAMSHIRE.—Bucks is an agricultural county, and returned two members from 1542 down to the Reform Act, when a third member was added. In former times the Duke of Buckingham and his family returned two members; but Stowe has fallen, and the times are changed. Among the most influential families at present are the Dashwoods and the Cavendishes. The population in 1851 had increased to 165,000 in twenty years from 146,000 to 163,000. Among the noted members of old should be named John Hampden, the patriot; Lord Grenville, and the Right Hon. Charles Grenville, both of whom were members of the county of Buckingham. Since the Reform Act Bucks has been represented by the present Duke, whilst he was Marquis of Chandos, Mr. J. B. Praed, Sir Wm. Young, Sir Scott Murray, Captain Fitzmaurice, and Mr. Tower. Its present members are

1. MR. CALEDON GEORGE DU PRE, a cousin of the Earl of Caledon, of strong Tory principles, who has sat since 1841. Cobden's recent motion and who, though he expresses a great admiration for Lord Palmerston's energy and ability, and promises to offer no factious opposition to his Government, has voted steadily on all Liberal measures

2. THE HON. CHARLES COMPTON CAVENDISH, an uncle of the Earl of Burlington, and who has had a seat in Parliament since 1820. He is a moderate Liberal, and professes himself in favour of relieving agricultural burdens, and of a moderate extension of the suffrage, though opposed to the ballot.

THE RIGHT HON. BENJAMIN DISRAELI, eldest son of the late Isaac D'Israeli, Esq., of Bradenham, Bucks (author of the "Curiosities of Literature"). He formerly sat for Maidstone and Shrewsbury, and was twice elected for Bucks to Parliament. He was Chancellor of the Exchequer and Ministerial Leader in the House of Commons under Lord Derby in 1852. His opinions as head of the Opposition in the Lower House are too well known to need repeating here. He first made his name known by his novel entitled "Vivian Grey," which was followed by several others: the most celebrated of them all is "Coningsby."

BURY, a manufacturing town of Lancashire, was erected into a borough in 1838. Its constituency, consisting of the 610 householders of Bury and the hamlet of Elton, numbered in 1852 no less than 939 registered electors against 559 at the previous date. It was continuously represented down to 1847 by Mr. R. Walker, a large cotton manufacturer in the town, and the last Parliament by Mr. F. Peel, whose father, the late Sir Robert Peel, was a native of the neighbourhood. The new member is

MR. RICHARD NEVILLE GRENFELL, a son of Mr. Phillips, of the Park and Manchester, and brother of Mr. Mark Philips, formerly M.P. for that city. He is a strong Liberal, with very "definite" principles, including household suffrage and vote by ballot. He is in favour of the Maynooth grant and admission of Jews, leaves the Sunday observance an open question, and supports Lord Palmerston's foreign policy. He will, however act against his Lordship if he is not prepared to grant a large measure of Parliamentary reform.

BURY ST. EDMUND'S, Suffolk, has returned two members since 1292. The Reform Act extended the constituency from the Mayor and Corporation to the 610 householders. These now number 781 registered electors. Bury, however, is still a close borough, as the Duke of Grafton and the Marquis of Bristol can each return one member. Its only distinguished member during the last century was Field Marshal Conway, Secretary of State under George III. Since the Reform Act, one seat was held continuously by Lord C. Fitzroy till 1847, when Mr. Bunbury was returned. The present members are

1. EARL JERMYN, eldest son of the Marquis of Bristol, a Peelite, or Liberal Conservative. He is in favour of Free-trade, national education, and moderate reform. He supported Mr. Cobden's motion on China.

2. MR. JOSEPH ALFRED HARDCASTLE, a barrister-at-law, who is a firm supporter of extended suffrage, the ballot, and removal of all religious disabilities. He will give Lord Palmerston an independent support.

CALNE, a small town of Wilts, and a pocket borough of the Marquis of Lansdowne, returned two members from 1295 to 1826. Being in the hands of an influential Whig nobleman, with some slight interruption, it escaped being disfranchised under the Reform Bill, though its constituency, consisting of the "ancient burgesses" to the 610 householders, numbered only 519: these being since decreased to little more than 200. Lord John Russell proposed to raise the constituency of Calne to a more respectable number by adding to it the parish of Melksham. In the "good old times" Calne counted among its members John Dunning (the celebrated Lord Ashburton), Colonel Barré (one of the reputed authors of "Junius"), and the present Lords Lansdowne and Dunfermline. Since the Reform Act it was represented by Lord Kerry till his death, and then by his brother, Lord Shelburne (the two sons of Lord Lansdowne), down to last year, when it returned its present member,

CAMBRIDGE, the county town of the shire of the same name, has returned two members since 1295. Among its more noted members, in old time, have been Sir Christopher Wren and Sousine Jones. Since the Reform Act it has returned Professor Pryme, Lord Monteagle (while he was Mr. Spring Rice), the late Sir A. Grant, and the Hon. W. F. Campbell. The constituency was found to be more than usually venal, as there have been several election petitions presented against the returns since 1832, and several times the returned members have been unseated. The present members are

1. MR. ANDREW STEUART, a barrister-at-law, who has never before sat in Parliament. He enters St. Stephen's, we believe, as a thorough supporter of Lord Derby.

2. MR. KENNETH MACAULAY, Q.C., the leader of the Midland Circuit He was elected in 1852, but unseated on petition. The local influence is divided between the Dukes of Rutland and Bedford, the Earl of Hardwicke, and Lord Godolphin. Among the more distinguished individuals who have sat for the county are Soame Jenyns, Lord Harley (who collected the Harleian MSS.), and the great Marquis of Granby. ## ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

THE Speech from the Throne announced that the negotiations in which the British Government had been engaged with the United States and Honduras, in regard to the affairs of Central America, had not yet been brought to a close. No further information on the subject has been given in Parliament; but with the good understanding which subsists between Great Britain and the United States, and which Lord Napier, our new representative at Washington, seems so well fitted to cement and extend, there is no reason to fear that any difficulties will arise. The question is very simple, and may be safely left to the good feeling of the two great nations who are interested in its solution. The temporary heats and jealousies that grew out of the Russian war and the Enlistment question have cooled and subsided; and the ground is clear for a settlement of all existing difficulties, if any such there be. The wires of the electric telegraph which are immediately to be laid under the waters of the Atlantic promise to have none but messages of commerce and of good will to convey. It would be strange, indeed, if with such means of communication between the kindred peoples of the Anglo-Saxon race, diminishing the distance between them to a few minutes, there should be any serious difference as to the right of way and the security of passage through Central America or the Isthmus of Panama. Great Britain desires no territory in that quarter of the globe. All that she requires, as the nation most largely interested in the commerce of the world, is the establishment of some authority in Central America which shall grant and maintain an unimpeded passage, either by railway or canal, or by both in combination, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. She wants no political privileges, and no right of protection or of dictation. The same facilities that she needs for her own commerce she would extend to the commerce of the whole world. Under such circumstances there can be no difficulties of which men imbued with common sense and actuated by good feeling cannot very shortly and satisfactorily dispose. We believe that the good sense and the good feeling exist both in Washington and in London, and that the appointment of such an Ambassador as Lord Napier, and the circumstances under which that appointment was made, have removed the last vestiges of irritation which existed against the "Old Country" on the other side of the Atlantic; and that henceforth there will exist a cordiality of sentiment, and a community of interests, which time will extend and ripen.

If we recall the subjects of dispute that have successively arisen between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States for the last twenty years, it will be easy to perceive that the respect, and we may add the affection, entertained by the one nation for the other are too great—founded, as they are, not upon policy alone, but upon nature—to be lightly disturbed. Had the two not been of the same blood, had they not spoken the same language, been taught by the same literature, learned to love and reverence the same Bible, and had they not had a community of fame and glory as well as of interest, there might have been war between them on the irritating question of the Canadian rebellion. There might have been war between them seven years later on the question of the Oregon boundary. There might also have been war on the question of the right of search—as our good-natured friend the late King Louis Philippe particularly wished there should be. There might have been war, too, on the subject of the Newfoundland fisheries, and war—or the excitement of a feeling which might at any moment and from unforeseen causes have provoked it—when Mr. Crampton and the British Consuls were dismissed by the Government of the late President. But all these topics of disquietude and danger were, after the first burst of excitement, treated in a sensible and conciliatory spirit by the real leaders of public opinion in both countries. Whatever a few public men, pledged to their party, and speaking for party exigencies, might have done or said, the hearts of the two nations were sound; and it was felt on all these occasions, by millions of people who had not the means of expressing their thoughts, that the scandal, the shame, the crime, the treason to the cause of humanity and civilisation would have, indeed, been monstrous and unpardonable if England and America had gone to war on these or any other pretexts. That feeling has continued to gain strength; and its existence is a far better guarantee for continued amity than any treaties of peace which diplomatists can frame.

If a notion still subsists in America that England is jealous of the unparalleled growth of her progeny—for such the Americans are, notwithstanding the large admixture of the German, French, and Spanish elements in the population—events, we doubt not, will tend to eradicate it. This country has no reason to be jealous of any extension of the Union, and looks forward, not only without alarm but with satisfaction, to the day when, from Panama to the St. Lawrence, there will be one grand Confederation of Anglo-Saxon States. Our own territory in America is large enough for English ambition. Canada and the Hudson's Bay territory are empires of themselves; and the American Union, in growing southward and westward, will neither alarm England, nor excite a feeling that such growth is unnatural, undesirable, or impolitic. As Lord Napier said in his admirable speech to the citizens of New York, "the peaceful and legitimate expansion of the United States forms a matter of satisfaction and pride for every reasonable Englishman. That expansion forms the best resort and relief for our superabundant population; it forms the best market for our increasing industry; it is the triumph of our labour and our arts—of our language, our religion, and our blood. No thoughtful Englishman can contemplate this unparalleled spectacle of future predominance without emotions of thankfulness and praise. No thoughtful foreigner can regard it without a sigh, that Providence has not reserved the future empire of the world for his own tongue and his own race." Lord Napier truly states that sentiments like these are not rare or partial in England. That he entertains them himself he eloquently avowed; though he only stated that he gathered them from such men as Lords Carlisle, Aberdeen, Elgin, Clarendon, and Palmerston, and had heard them declared and enforced by both of the great parties in the House of Commons. He might have gone further, and with more effect, by adding that every newspaper of the slightest note in this country is, and has long been, engaged in promulgating the same feeling; and that although, as is the custom of Englishmen, we criticise America as we criticise ourselves and everything else, our Lords and Earls and members of Parliament do not lead public opinion, but follow it. The pride with which Englishmen regard their brothers across the Atlantic was fostered by the press of England long before professional statesmen of any party condescended to be aware of it. Lord Napier either forgot or did not think it proper to say so; but it is right that the Americans should remember that the sympathies of the British people are with them. If a day should ever come when Lords and Earls should, in the complexities and perversities of party warfare, entertain different opinions or a different policy, the British people will still remain true to their sympathy with America. On that foundation rests their mutual friendship; and this friendship forms the best guarantee for the continued progress of civilisation. Continental Europe may retrograde both in wealth and liberty; but, while England and America remain united, nations less fortunate than they will always have examples which they can follow, and a hope on which to rely.

THE NEW SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR JOHN EVELYN DENISON is the head and representative of a family which rose into opulence, some century and a half ago, from mercantile success. Like the families of Heathcote, Craven, Osborne, and some dozens of others which adorn the pages of our Peerages and Baronetages at this day, the founder of the Denison family was a merchant of the city of London, one William Denison. This gentleman had two sons—of whom the younger, Sir Thomas Denison, became one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench in 1742. He is said to have been the intimate friend of the great Lord Mansfield, who wrote the inscription which still marks his tomb in the parish church of Hazlewood, Yorkshire. This worthy Knight, having no issue of his own, bequeathed his property to Mr. Edmund Beckett, sixth son of the late Right Hon. Sir John Beckett, Bart., who, many years ago, represented the borough of Leeds. Mr. Edmund Beckett, in 1816, assumed, by Royal license, the name of Denison, and is now Mr Edmund Beckett Denison, the member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, well known for the scientific interest which he has taken in all kinds of clocks and bells, and more especially in the construction of "Big Ben" of Westminster. While the [illegible] was to be the law [illegible] of Mr William [illegible] was raised [illegible] Wood, was [illegible] and parents in Leeds, [illegible] large fortune. With the [illegible] he became the estate [illegible] near Newark, in Nottinghamshire, and served the office of High Sheriff of that county in 1779. He died at Bath in 1782. His eldest son, John, who inherited Ossington, was for many years M.P. for Chichester, and for the since disfranchised borough of Minehead. He was married twice. By his first wife he had an only daughter, who married the late Speaker, the Right Hon. Sir Charles Manners Sutton, afterwards Viscount Canterbury. By his second wife he had a large family, consisting of nine sons and three daughters.

It is remarkable that six of these nine sons have risen to distinction in their several lines of life. The eldest of the Mr. John Evelyn Denison, the newly-elected Speaker of the House of Commons; the second son, Edward, was formerly Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and was afterwards Bishop of Salisbury from 1837 till his death, in 1854; the third son, Sir William Denison, recently gazetted K.C.B., is a Captain in the Royal Engineers, and Governor-General of Australia; the fourth son is the Venerable George Anthony Denison, Archdeacon of Taunton, against whom ecclesiastical proceedings have been taken by the Evangelical party in the Established Church, on account of the alleged Popish tendency of his views as to the Real Presence, with the intention of depriving him of his preferments; the fifth and sixth sons, Henry and Stephen Charles, both barristers-at-law, were highly distinguished at Oxford as First-Class men, and Fellows respectively of All Souls and University Colleges.

Mr John Evelyn Denison was born in 1800, and was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated B.A. in 1823, and M.A. in 1828. His public career is well known. His first entered Parliament, we believe, under the auspices of the late Right Hon. George Canning, in July, 1823, as member for Newcastle-under-Lyne, for which place he sat till the dissolution of 1826. In the latter year he was elected for Higham Ferrers, which he represented till the close of 1830. In the early part of 1831 he was returned both for Liverpool and for his own native county of Nottinghamshire, and he chose to sit for the latter. At the general election of Dec., 1832, he was sent to Parliament as the representative of the Southern Division of the county, which he continued to represent down to the dissolution of July, 1837. He was not a member of the first Parliament of Queen Victoria, which assembled in that year; but in 1841 he was returned for Earl Fitzwilliam's borough of Malton, which he represented down to the recent general election, when he succeeded to the seat for North Nottinghamshire, left vacant by the retirement of Lord Henry William Bentinck. Mr. Denison was for a short time a Lord of the Admiralty under Mr. Canning's Administration, in 1827-28. As his sister's marriage with the late Sir Charles Manners Sutton brought him into connection with the ducal house of Rutland, so his marriage in 1827, with the Lady Charlotte Bentinck, daughter of the late Duke of Portland, was a fortunate alliance, as it connected him with one of the most wealthy and powerful of titled houses.

THE Princess Charlotte, 104, sailing three-decker, fitting out at Portsmouth as a floating barrack for troops on the China station, is ordered to be put in hand by the end of the month. Cabins are being fitted up for the military officers who may have to go on board her. The troops will sleep in hammocks, each man having two blankets, which is considered to be a much more comfortable way of sleeping on board ship than on the hard boards of the deck. The Princess Charlotte will have accommodation for 1600 men and officers, who will be berthed on the middle and lower decks. The arrangements for ventilation and other sanitary necessities appear to have had great care bestowed upon them, with the view of preserving the health of those on board. She will be stowed with as much of the munitions of war as she can conveniently be made to carry in dependently of the necessary provisions and stores for her own use, not to count her three-decker armament, but only a dozen 32-pounders for special service.

THAT ribbon of railway that lies to the north of London, and which connects Kew and the Windsor line, the London and North-Western, the Great Northern, and the whole of the Eastern Counties lines, and the city of London, is becoming every day more and more important. The western district through which it runs is one of great beauty, more particularly in the vicinity of Kilburn. At the latter place the company are enlarging the station to give greater accommodation to a neighbourhood which is springing up around this elevated and healthy spot. A very spacious church is already open for Divine service, and the nucleus of another for Dissenters is in active existence. The former rears its well-proportioned parts amidst villas and other dwellings of a character evidently fast and building with the view of attracting the middle classes to a picturesque vicinity, equally removed from the sight of London and the miasmatic influences of its mighty, yet silent, highway—the Thames. Kilburn, as it ere was, with its Priory, its Holy Well, and numberless other departed associations, would be now as a terra incognita to the antiquarian. But the loveliness of the neighbourhood yet exists. Those lanes of North End and Hampstead which are still the favourite drives of her Majesty and the Royal family, with the still more elevated background of Hampstead itself, will ever remain, protected as they happily are by legislative enactment from the ruthless hand of lucre-loving man. The ecclesiastics of old will long possess in Kilburn an additional evidence of that taste and judgment which influenced the choice of such sites for their dwelling-places, as affording health for the body and delight to the eye, with the concomitant advantages of an agreeable altitude, freshness of soil, and excellence of water. The railway companies are evidently impressed with the policy of encouraging short suburban trains, and with this view are making an extra line of rails to communicate with the docks and the goods depôts, so that the luggage traffic shall be altogether removed from those lines which ought to be exclusively devoted to passenger transit. When this additional line is completed extra trains will run over the passenger metals and at increased speed. In the latter respect, however, while the trains are in motion there is nothing to be complained of.

It is whispered that a Liverpool cotton broker "potted" £30,000 by the success of Leamington at Chester.—Liverpool Albion.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

THE PERSIAN WAR.

In our last publication we gave the telegraphic despatch received from Sir James Outram, in which he announced the capture of Mohammerah. The following confirmatory information has been received by the Overland Mail:—The capture of Mohammerah, on the 26th March, by General Outram, with a force of 4500 men, which left Bushire on the 19th, is confirmed. The entrance of the Karoon had been skilfully fortified by the enemy; but the forts were silenced by the steamers in two hours. Prince Khanaus Mirza, at the head of 13,000 men, fled, with a loss of 200, leaving ammunition, stores, camp equipages, and 17 guns. Gen. Stalker and Commodore Etheridge committed suicide in a moment of temporary insanity. The verdict on General Stalker's body was that he came by his death from a pistol shot, inflicted by his own hand in a fit of temporary insanity. There was no paper left to indicate this, and he was merely heard to complain that the 3rd Cavalry was not given him; and was also uneasy about the responsibility of sheltering the European troops during the approaching hot weather. The verdict on Commodore Etheridge was that he destroyed himself with his own hand while suffering under mental aberration, brought about by long-continued anxiety connected with the duties of his command.

The Times correspondent, writing from Mohammerah on the 6th of March, gives the following account of the proceedings up to that date:—

My last gave you an account of the capture of this place on the 26th ult., and the precipitate flight of the large Persian army. Without baggage cattle to carry the camp equipages we could not, of course, follow them up, so without loss of time Sir James ordered a small expedition to be got ready with all dispatch, in order to track the enemy on the banks of the Karoon river. This expedition consisted of three small river steamers—viz., the Comet, Planet, and Assyria (the first of which is my present one gun-boat, and three cutters, under the command of Captain Commodore Rennie, of the Indian Navy; and 300 men from her Majesty's 64th, still under the command of Capt. Hunt of the other corps. General Sir James Outram also accompanied them, and put in charge of Political Agent at Bagdad. He expected both at noon on the 28th, and on the 29th found a considerable portion of the Persian army from which it appeared that they had taken guns at Hoveizeh, and were encamped some distance—found out afterwards to be the Shah with a carriage. Here it seems that one of the gun-carriages had been broached, and the gun accordingly put into a boat, which was afterwards captured on its way to Ahwaz, the capital. Almost at the first sight of our preparations the large mass, consisting of about 8000 men, took to flight, and retreated hurriedly in the direction of Dizful, while horsemen from the rear were observed hanging on their rear, ready to plunder or harass them. The expedition remained two days at Ahwaz, communicating with the Arab tribes, and securing or destroying large heaps of grain which had been stored there by the Persians. A number of mules and sheep were also captured and brought down by the steamers, and 150 new stands of muskets in cases. This done, the little band returned to Mohammerah, which they reached on the 4th inst.

The moral effect of this little affair will be great in these parts, for the Persians had boasted that no force we could bring against Mohammerah could take it in less than a year, and, confident in this overweening security, they had made no preparations for an orderly retreat. It is clear that the Persian army in this quarter is utterly disorganised and can never make head against us. It was the intention of Sir James to have moved up a sufficient part of our force to another point to put the troops into summer quarters in that reputed healthy locality and to have taken the remainder himself to Shiraz to overawe Shah Bashi's army before Bushire. He must indeed have a great longing to meet this gentleman, whose name they have surnamed into "Cheeky Bashi;" but, as all our schemes are for the present held in abeyance by the news, which arrived yesterday, that peace was signed in Paris on the 4th ult. What will be done next no one appears to know.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

"Further papers" relating to the proceedings of our naval forces at Canton were published on Saturday last by order of Parliament, to whom they were laid presented by Royal command. The correspondence (principally between Sir J. Bowring and the Earl of Clarendon) extends from the 27th of December, 1856, to the 30th ult. We quote the following significant passage from Sir J. Bowring's despatch to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, 1857:—

I have the comfort of believing (writes Sir John) that, notwithstanding the losses, privations, sufferings, and disquietudes which these events have produced, there exists an almost unanimity of opinion among her Majesty's subjects in China as to the opportunity and necessity of the measures that have been taken. The only regret with the cross which has occurred was an inevitable one, while pride, presumption, faithlessness, and ignorance on the other hand rejoiced. And it has greatly added to my gratification to know that the representative of the French Government have generally concurred in approving the course which has been pursued. Indeed I may safely say that I have rather had to struggle against demands for more violent and destructive measures than to fear censure for those which have been adopted.

The Moniteur de la Flotte says that the Audacieuse frigate, carrying Baron Gros to China, will go alone, and that no measures are being taken, at least as yet, to prevent, to send any other vessels of war or any troops to China. The Pique frigate has been ordered sending of some battalions of infantry and marines by the Yonne has been postponed.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

Intelligence from Vienna states that news from the Danubian Provinces had been received by telegraph. Important despatches had arrived there from Constantinople, in consequence of which the Kaimakams of Moldavia and Wallachia had addressed circulars to the authorities recommending non-interference with the meetings held concerning the union.

PRUSSIA. CLOSE OF THE CHAMBERS.

The Session of the Prussian Chambers was closed on the 12th inst by a Royal Message read by M. de Manteuffel.

The Message enumerates the various measures adopted during the Session; it mentions likewise the measures which have not passed; it alludes to the bill relative to the publication of papers and to foreign notes, and expresses the hope that a general understanding on this measure will be come to with other States. The Message expresses satisfaction at the conclusion of the negotiations for the settlement of the Sound Dues.

The Royal Message does not make any allusion to foreign politics.

We learn by telegraph that the festivities at Berlin in honour of Prince Napoleon were continued. The King and Queen honoured with their presence the ball given in the Prince's honour by Baron de Moustier, the French Ambassador.

A grand military review was held on the 12th. The Prince of Prussia gave a grand banquet to the French Prince on the 13th. Prince Napoleon was to leave on Thursday, the 14th, for Dresden. Her Majesty the Queen of Prussia left Berlin on the 13th for the Castle of Fillnitz, near Dresden.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the Royal mail steam-ship Arabia at Liverpool, on Sunday last, we have dates from New York to the 29th ult.; and by the City of Washington, on Wednesday, we have dates from New York to the 30th ult.

The struggle between the Democrats and Republicans regarding Kansas threatens to break out again in a worse manner than the last. The Hon. F. P. Stanton, the newly-appointed Secretary of the debatable territory, arrived at Leavenworth City on the 19th ult., and delivered an address to the people in the evening, which was received with cheers. He declared further that the territorial laws would be enforced. Dr. Stringfellow proceed Mr. Stanton. It was election day, and hence the speaking. Dr. Stringfellow in the course of his speech said, to make Kansas a Slave State, and, failing in this, he should strive, as the next best thing, to make it a Democratic Free State. The Free State men express strong dislike of Stanton's avowals, as he has evidently joined the Pro-Slavery party.

The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald furnishes a list of the vessels of war ordered to the coast of New Granada in anticipation of the adoption of measures having for their object the solution of the questions in dispute between that Republic and the United States. The Independence, Decatur, John Adams, and St. Marys rendezvous at Panama; and the Wabash, Saratoga, and Crane, at Aspinwall, where they will probably be joined by the Roanoke. The squadrons combined present a force of 204 guns.

Indian troubles in Iowa, Minnesota, and Nebraska are very serious, and a general border warfare with the Sioux and Pawnees seems imminent.

The steam-ship Empire City, at New Orleans, brings dates from California to the 6th instant, but no news of importance from the Golden State beyond the fact of general dulness of business and the failure of the Pacific Express Company. This arrival confirms the retreat of Lockridge and his Filibuster followers, who were taken to Aspinwall by British vessels, and thence to New Orleans in the Crescent City. Among those returned are Generals Wheat and Hornsby. The transit route is now entirely in the hands of the Costa Ricans, who recently took possession of Punta Arenas, and the steamer Rescue, with a considerable quantity of ammunition and six pieces of artillery. The steamer J. L. Stephens, from San Francisco to Panama, brings no further intelligence from Walker; but a private despatch from Aspinwall to New Orleans states that Walker's position at Rivas is likely to hold out for months yet.

From Nicaragua we have late and important news. The cause of Walker is more desperate than ever; it is so utterly hopeless that his own friends do not suppose him capable of holding out beyond the 20th of April. The reports of his victories on the 5th and 15th of March were fictitious. No such victories were obtained, nor was there any such slaughter of the Costa Ricans as the Filibusters represented. Walker did attack San Jorge on the 16th ult.; but he was repulsed with heavy loss. The allies, since that day, have been gradually closing round him. By way of the lake we have accounts from Rivas to the 13th of April. The Walker force there then only amounted to 150 men. They were confined in two houses, and had no provisions. The enemy, who also held San Juan del Sur, surrounded them at every point.

The news from the Atlantic side confirms previous reports, that the force under Colonel Lockridge was broken up. The men, some 300 in number, were brought in British frigates to Aspinwall. Our correspondents give full and highly-interesting particulars of the events to which we have thus briefly alluded.

From San Salvador we receive the important intelligence that the partition of Nicaragua among the allies has been finally settled. The native Nicaraguans are represented as consenting parties to the division.

The news from California is of interest. The trial of the State Comptroller before the Senate, as a High Court of Impeachment, was in progress, and it was believed would result in a conviction.

OVER THE WATER.

"LE NORD" is a journal that strangely earns its stipends. Its latest effort is an imaginary Imperial game at romps at Villeneuve l'Etang, the property in the possession of the French Emperor, near St. Cloud. Here, according to its clumsy story, the Emperor and Empress, with the Duke Constantine and their suites, played out a mimic assault. The ladies, the Nord declared, occupied a hill under the generalship of the Empress, from which the Emperor, the Russian Duke, followed by all the male members of their suites, all hopping upon one leg, endeavoured to dislodge the determined Amazons. There were people, undoubtedly, who believed the story; and there were not wanting enemies of the Imperial régime to comment on the undignified amusements of the French Court. Other sagacious people put forth an explanation which assumed that the account of this imaginary romp was simply a political allegory. It is usually no easy matter to fathom Muscovite diplomacy. We are, therefore, inclined to believe that the invention of the Nord correspondent had no official source whatever. The writer may have imagined that he would give pleasure in certain quarters by representing the French Court in a ludicrous and vulgar light; but the promptness with which the journal he honoured with his fable was stopped at the frontiers of France, will have taught him, by this time, to serve any patrons he may have, with more discretion for the future. A story bearing a close resemblance to this romp at Villeneuve l'Etang reached us while the Duke and Duchess of Brabant were at St. Cloud. There is a game, very popular in Germany, called Black Peter. A pack of cards is dealt out in equal numbers to the company, three of the four knaves having been previously withdrawn. Each person then examines his cards, and pairs off as many as possible, casting the pairs into the middle of the table. This done, the dealer turns his hand back upwards, and offers to the person on his left the choice of a card. This person, having drawn one, tries to pair it with one in his hand; and thus he in his turn offers those he has remaining to his neighbour. And so the game goes round—it being the object of every player to get rid of his cards by pairing them off as rapidly as possible. One card, however—the knave—cannot be paired; and the person who is left with this Black Peter in his hand is the loser. The game is a lively one; since every player to whom Black Peter is passed endeavours to assume a careless air and give it to his neighbour—especially as the loser has to undergo a trial from which many fair players shrink with horror. The forfeit is this, that the loser be painted by one of the company. This painting is generally of the most extravagant description. Sometimes the loser finds his nose deeply tinged with ultramarine, and his forehead splendid as the rainbow. Another will find his cheeks covered with geometrical figures in red ochre. The ladies are usually let off with a moustache and a little rouge; and the game goes on till every person present has lost, save one; each person retiring from the game as he is painted. It is the privilege of the person last painted to paint the next loser. Well, we were assured that the Duchess of Brabant introduced this game at St. Cloud to the Emperor and Empress, and that her Royal Highness actually exhibited her eye for colour upon the physiognomy of his Majesty Napoleon III.!

There is a curious development of Imperial hospitality in the reception of the Russian Duke, however, which deserves particular mention viz., that, while Constantine sits in his private rooms in the Tuileries, he is in direct communication with St. Petersburg; since the electric wire which will traverse Europe from Paris to the Russian capital have been taken to his very chamber. We remember an enterprising editor who had determined to sit in his editorial chair and to be able to speak with his Continental correspondents; but it has remained for Napoleon III. to offer the wires of the electric telegraph as a part of his Czarish's correspondence.

From prosperous Royalty we turn to Royalty in exile. The Frances Centrale has this week published a letter addressed by the Count de Chambord to General Count de la Rochejaquein on the occasion of the death of his sister-in-law. The Royal Count asks why he could not be a witness of the great homage which had just been paid to the remains of the venerable lady, and in her person "to the whole of La Vendée"? But he read, from his exile, with deep emotion "the affecting recital of the funeral solemnity." The heart and the mind of the Royal Count accompanied the illustrious deceased to her last dwelling with the crowd which followed her coffin. She was, to him, a high-minded woman—the wife, the daughter, and the sister of those heroes and martyrs who fought so valiantly, and whose generous blood was shed so lavishly, in one of the most sacred and most glorious struggles that ever took place. This is very well; but why publish all this sorrow and all this admiration in the Frances Centrale? The calm observer cannot help asking himself whether it is real emotion, or a clever advertisement.

From funeral hymns we turn to the Opera Comique, where Etienne and Nicolo's "Joconde" has been most successfully revived; the principal parts being taken by Mdlles. Lefebvre and Boulart and M. Faure. But from Rome strange news arrives of the production of a religious melodrama, in two parts, called "St. Cecilia." This carries us far back; but we, who lately saw Adam and Eve on the Parisian stage cowering before a property serpent, cannot be greatly astonished.

In conclusion, let us notice a suggestion—to be sent, we trust, over the water—of a grand banquet and festival to be offered in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, to the living artists of all nations. We trust, in the course of the summer, to see Horace Vernet, Ary Scheffer, Gerome, Doré, Rousseau, Jeanron, Meissonnier, Stevens, Knaus, Madrazo, &c., shaking hands with the artists of England in our cotton metropolis.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THERE is more in the inauguration of a new Parliament than a mere abstract interest. The Legislature is to us something more than a law-making machine; it is a public amusement—it is a breakfast-table stimulant;—and its debates are the most pleasant when they are records of intellectual gladiatorism. We take, nationally, an intense delight in watching the individual contests, the party struggles, the personal duels, so to speak, by means of which the genius of our Constitution is evoked, and which produce political motion and progression. We, in a certain sense, personify principles, and a Session is not to a large number the history of questions carried or rejected, but the record of a tournament between political knights, errant or otherwise. From the point of view the present Session is anything but promising. The elision of the names of some of the most combative members from the roll of Parliament at the election, whose places are supplied by aspirants who have yet their spurs to win, and who, if they are wise, will not be in a hurry to make the attempt, has materially reduced the personal element in the House of Commons. The leaders who remain are singularly quiescent. Mr. Gladstone has not appeared in his place since the evening of the moving of the Address; Mr Disraeli sits moodily, evidently in search of a grievance; Lord John Russell is at Manchester; and Mr. Sidney Herbert, having crossed over the gangway and taken a seat behind the Treasury bench, preparatory, as it is supposed, to stepping on to it, is judiciously silent; while Sir James Graham pursues his old course of never initiating anything, but waiting till a question is half on its way before he strikes in. As regards the Upper House, as Lord Derby is laid up with the gout, any attempt at a debate is of course hopeless; for it is out of the power of Lords Grey, Clanricarde, or Albemarle to stir up any one to answer them; and dreariness settles each evening on the Peers long before six o'clock.

In the Lower House, nevertheless, the business of the Session has begun satisfactorily, if not brilliantly. The newness of the situation, which probably caused early and sudden adjournments last week, had worn off sufficiently on Monday, and it was not unamusing to observe how quickly members dropped into the old conventional habits of the place. There was the same crowd as ever from half-past four to six, the same eager interest in the interrogation of Ministers, and the same rush out to dinner when the orders of the day—which were not strikingly stimulative were called on. Any one, listening to the first debate of the new Parliament, who has been accustomed to the place and the speakers, would have been inclined to doubt whether there had been a general election. In vain hour after hour did one watch for a spark of new membership to lighten across the humdrum talk of all the old, and many of the dullest, hands, the humdrum talk of all the old, and many of the dullest, hands, who have long been accustomed to maunder out generalities, or to nibble at details. It was not until the very last ember of the debate was dying out that at length a neophyte took courage to deliver an idea; and, as ill-luck would have it, he made a mess of it; for the subject being transportation, he claimed the ear of the House on the ground that he had much personal experience of a penal colony. Thereat, of course, a laugh—not with, but at, him—which makes all the difference.

As it is desirable that the new-comers should be drilled in the platoon exercise of a division, Mr. Bowyer was good-natured enough to give them an opportunity of seeing how that simple piece of machinery by which this country is governed is worked; while at the same time he very nearly stirred up the spirit of acrimony by introducing the religious controversial element into the question of Industrial Schools; and, but for the forbearance or the absence of Mr. Spooner and Mr. Napier, that might have led to a premature display of flame policies with the renewal of the attack on the former gentlemen on the College of Maynooth promises space and verge enough. The evolution in the lobbies was successfully carried on under the attached supervision of Mr. Hayter; who, being not interested personally, acted on this occasion the part of an amateur adjutant. By the way, talking of amateurs, it may be noticed that Viscount Eversley is very assiduous in his visits to the House, and giving his countenance very decidedly to his successor in the Speakership; that functionary is fast gaining a most satisfactory amount of "aplomb." If the ex-Speaker were inclined to be critical he might, perhaps, hint that Mr. Evelyn Denison's defect is a want of alacrity; which is especially noticeable in the way in which he deals with the presentation of petitions. However distant a member may be, the present Speaker never puts the formal question that "the petition do lie on the table," until it is actually brought up by the member presenting it; whereas, Mr. Shaw Lefevre used to get the object of three or four petitions stated in the time which is now occupied in the bringing up of one.

There has been going about a statement that Lord Palmerston is threatened with a physical breakdown, and that he shows the symptoms palpably in the House. As far as a somewhat close observation enables one to judge, the notion must be derived more from a very unpleasant photograph of the noble Lord which has recently appeared in the shop windows than from his actual appearance on the Treasury Bench, or from the sound of his voice. Any one who had gathered their notion of him from that portrait, and who heard and saw him on Tuesday, when he so significantly turned to Mr. Locke King, and all but inquired whether that gentleman was really about to try his hand once more at putting out a Ministry, by the introduction of one of his bit-by-bit Parliamentary Reform bills, would, perhaps, be inclined to doubt the fidelity of the photographic art. It is a delicate subject; but it is to be remarked that the state of Lord Palmerston's health may always be gathered from the pervading colour of his whiskers: when they display a darkened hue, depend upon it he is quite well; and when he is suffering from indisposition, it is equally certain that sable yields to silver. At present the former colour is in the ascendant. One is glad to notice also a very perceptible increase of vigour in Mr. Roebuck. His step is firmer than it has been for many a long day; his voice has recovered all its steadiness and tone; and his general appearance indicates a renewal of health, which promises well for his activity in a Parliament which, let it elicit what powerful membership it may, could ill spare the keen intellect and crisp debating powers of the member for Sheffield. With reference to a notion above indicated that ensuing debates will not possess the flavour which they are expected to communicate to the morning tea and toast of the public, it may be mentioned that Mr. Henry Drummond appears to be flourishing, and has already given hope that he will from time to time infuse into future discussions those sharp eccentricities and witty paradoxes which it is supposed are the last relics of that style of Parliamentary epigram which ceased to exist as an institution with Canning and Brougham.

There is not wanting abundance of valetudinations with regard to the prospects of the necessarily short Session before us. The serenity of its inauguration the seers declare is no warrant for its future career. It is denied that the House of Commons is bound to the chariot-wheels of Lord Palmerston; that it is a united, happy family; that it represents distinctions without differences; and will progress in comfort, innocent of a single wicked or malicious division. In short, to be intensely trite and colloquial, there is so much calm that a storm must be brewing. Perhaps the best practical comment on this notion, and as an indication of the inclinations of those old members who are still the great majority of the House, it may be stated that the phrase "this period of the Session" is constantly recurring, and that one of the re-elected has already been inquiring about the length of the Whitsuntide vacation.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.

MR. CRAUFURD moved the second reading of the Judgments Execution, &c., Bill, which was the same in its provisions as former bills which he had been for four years bringing under the consideration of the House.

Colonel FRENCH opposed the bill, which would have the effect of inducing upon England and Ireland the barbarisms of Scottish law. He moved, as an amendment, that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. ELAND seconded the amendment.

MR. AYRTON opposed the bill, which he could not look upon as a useful measure of legal reform. It was, in fact, a step in the wrong direction, and calculated to lead to much inconvenience and injustice.

MR. M'MAHON said the bill was a direct violation of the principles of law and jurisprudence, and he should therefore oppose it, as he had done on former occasions.

MR. NEATE supported the bill, contending that the objections alleged against it might be obviated in Committee.

MR. WAITESIDE said that a bill of such importance, if desirable at all, should be brought in by the Government, and not by a private individual. He looked upon the measure as one full of mischief.

MR. MALINS would support the second reading of the bill; but would move, in Committee, the omission of all the clauses respecting Scotch decrees, to which Mr. M'Mahon had raised such strong objections, unless those objections should be satisfactorily answered by some of the advocates of the measure.

The LORD ADVOCATE supported the principle of the bill, which was that of giving effect to judgments in England, Ireland, and Scotland, no matter in which country the party might reside.

MR NAPIER supported the amendment, contending that the bill would create great collusion, fraud, and injustice.

After some observations from Mr Hadfield and Mr. Stuart, the House divided, and the amendment was negatived by a majority of 137 to 99

The bill was then read a second time.

ELECTION EXPENSES.—Lord R. GROSVENOR moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter the law in reference to the payment of the conveyance of voters to the polls and the hustings expenses at elections. The objects of the bill were in conformity with the legislation of the last thirty years and that relating to the hustings expenses was strongly recommended by a Committee.—MR. AYRTON seconded the motion.—MR. W. WILLIAMS doubted if, as a matter of economy, the bill would answer the object of the noble Lord. Mr H. DRUMMOND said the effect of the bill would be to disfranchise all the poorer voters, and it would also give an advantage to town over country constituences.—The House divided, and the noble Lord's motion was carried by a majority of 151 to 58.

Mr. HEADLAM obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the laws relating to the medical profession. The bill is the same as that of last Session.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

THE OPIUM TRADE.—The Lord CHANCELLOR, in reply to the Earl of Shaftesbury, said, in consequence of what had taken place in that House towards the end of last Session in reference to the opium trade with China, the President of the Board of Control had instructed the proper officer to draw up a case embodying the whole facts connected with that trade, for the purpose of being submitted to the law officers of the Crown for their opinion. That case had been prepared, and was ordered to be transmitted to the Court of Directors of the East India Company, with a view of ascertaining whether they concurred in the truth of the facts therein set forth. He believed the case would in a few days be ready for the consideration of the law officers of the Crown.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at a few minutes before four o'clock, when several new members were sworn in BRAZIL.—Mr. ROEBUCK gave notice of his intention on that day fortnight to move for a Select Committee to inquire into our relations with Brazil

THE BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.—Mr ROEBUCK gave notice that he should on that day fortnight move for a Select Committee to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.—Mr GREY postponed for a week his motion for bringing in a bill to establish Industrial schools in England.

CUFFY THE CHARTIST.—Mr T. DUNCOMBE said he had seen a letter stating that William Cuffy, who had been transported for a political offence, had not received the free pardon which was last year extended to all political offenders except those who had fled from their custody. Cuffy could had been good during his exile, and he Mr Duncombe thought there must be some mistake in the matter. He, therefore, wished to know whether the statement to which he referred was true. Sir G. GREY said it was possible that there might have been some mistake in the matter, or the dispatch sent out and which had been delayed in consequence of the forms necessary to be gone through, to confer a full and free pardon, might not have arrived in the colony up to the date of the letter from which the hon member quoted. At all events, it was clearly intended that Cuffy should be included in the amnesty.

EDUCATION.—Sir J. PAKINGTON, in reply to Mr. Slaney, said it was not his intention to introduce an Education Bill during the present Session, but should content himself with moving a resolution on the subject.

NAVY ESTIMATES.—Sir C. WOOD said he should move the NAVY ESTIMATES on Monday.

PROTECTION OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Sir E. PERRY asked leave to bring in a bill to amend the law of property, as it affected married women and their separate earnings. He proposed to adopt the principle of the Roman law, by giving to husband and wife the separate enjoyment of their own property, except in so far as it might be affected by settlements made before marriage.

Mr. DRUMMOND seconded the motion, and expressed his opinion that, in order to effect this object completely, it would be necessary to give facilities for a divorce.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he had no objection to the introduction of the bill, although he thought the author of it had undertaken a difficult and onerous task in endeavouring to render women so entirely independent of their husbands

Sir J. PAKINGTON recommended Sir E. Perry to reconsider the subject, and to amend his bill in various particulars.

Mr. B. HOPE was of opinion that legislation on the subject would be useless.

Mr M. MILNES thought that the subject was well worthy of the serious consideration of the House.

Mr. MALINS was favourable to the general principle of the bill, but he objected to the constitution of any separate rights of property on the part of the wife while living with her husband

Leave was then given to introduce the bill.

PUBLIC CONTRACTS.—On the motion of Colonel BOLDERO, a Select Committee was ordered to inquire into the system of Government contracts in force upon the expenditure of public money.

MINISTERS' MONEY IN IRELAND.—Mr. FAGAN asked leave to bring in a Bill to abolish Ministers' Money in Ireland.—Lord PALMERSTON intimated his approval of the principle of the measure.—Mr. DISRAELI thought that it would be much more convenient for the Government to take the bill into their own hands, as the noble Lord had just declared his approval of it. He would feel bound to oppose the measure.—Sir G. GREY said the Government had already their hands full, and the bill would have a better chance of being fully discussed in a private member's than it could have on a Government night. After some further remarks, leave was given for the introduction of the bill.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS IN SCOTLAND.—The LORD ADVOCATE obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the law for the Registration of Persons entitled to Vote in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for Counties in Scotland.

THE BURIAL ACTS.—Mr. MASSEY obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend the Burial Acts.

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.—Lord ELCHO obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the laws regulating the Medical Profession.

PROPOSED REPEAL OF THE FRENCH USURY LAWS.—The Bank of France bill presented to the Corps Legislatif on Saturday last differs materially from the scheme circulated at the Bourse. The capital is to be doubled, and the produce of the new shares, instead of being applied to relieve the immediate wants of the Treasury, will be locked up to the extent of 100,000,000 fr., in the course of the year 1859. To cover itself, the bank will receive a sum of Three per Cent. Rentes at 75 fr., from the Caisse d'Amortissement. The privileges of the bank, it will be seen are to be prolonged for thirty years. In exchange for these advantages, the bank is to make advances upon Credit Foncier obligations as well as upon public securities and railway shares. It undertakes, moreover, to make advances to the Treasury not exceeding 80,000,000 fr. A very important clause in the bill is that which permits the bank to add a charge for commission to the interest upon its advances and discounts. This question has been very vehemently discussed. The change amounts in substance to a partial repeal of the French usury laws. Instead of being prohibited from taking more than 6 per cent., while the Bank of England may be lending at 7 or 8 per cent., the Bank of France will now be able to charge whatever rate money may be worth in the market.

The canal destined to unite Caen with the sea, which was commenced fifteen or sixteen years ago, will be entirely terminated in a fortnight, and will be opened for navigation in about a month. It will have cost 10,000,000 fr.

THE COURT.

The Queen is enjoying the retirement of her marine retreat in the Isle of Wight preparatory to the galeties of the London season, which will be inaugurated by the Sovereign with a grand Drawingroom at St. James's Palace, on the 9th proximo. A Levee is also announced for the 18th June, and on Tuesday, the 23rd proximo her Majesty will hold a second Drawingroom. Thus, although the dissolution of Parliament and the death of the Duchess of Gloucester have contributed to postpone the usual hospitalities of the Court of St. James's, there appears to be no foundation for believing that the season will be shorn of any of its accustomed gaiety.

On Saturday last the Marquis of Breadalbane, Lord Chamberlain, had an audience of the Queen, to present the Address from the House of Lords in answer to the Speech from the Throne.

On Sunday the Prince, the Princess Royal, the Princess Alice, and the Princess Helena attended Divine service at Whippingham Church, where the Rev. G. Protheroe officiated.

On Monday Viscount Castlerosse, Comptroller of the Household, had an audience of the Queen, to present the Address from the House of Commons in answer to the Speech from the Throne.

On Tuesday the Duchess of Kent arrived at Osborne on a visit to her Majesty.

The Duchess of Atholl has succeeded the Marchioness of Ely as Lady in Waiting.

The Court will return to Windsor Castle on or about the 8th of June, to remain three weeks, during which period her Majesty will dispense her hospitality to a numerous circle of distinguished guests—among whom, it is expected, the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia will be included.

THE DUCHESS OF KENT.

The following announcement has appeared in the Morning Post newspaper:—"We learn, with deep regret, that the state of the Duchess of Kent's health is not altogether such as her Royal Highness's family and friends could desire. It is stated that symptoms of an unfavourable character have recently shown themselves, and caused considerable anxiety among those who enjoy the confidential intimacy of her Royal Highness."

Upon this, acting under official authority, the Court newsman gives the following:

We are authorised to state that, though her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent has been unwell, her Royal Highness' health is nearly perfectly re-established at the present time; and that there is no foundation whatever for the report that any anxiety is entertained for her Royal Highness by her friends."

The nation will reciprocate our hope that the latter announcement is correct; but painful rumours confirming the statement of our daily contemporary are undoubted.y in circulation.

His Excellency the Russian Minister at the Court of St. James's, and the Countess Chreptowitch, returned to town from Paris on Wednesday.

The Countess D'Appony has issued cards for assemblies at Chandos House on the 16th and 20th instant.

Lord Brougham may be expected to arrive in town from his château in the south of France about the 20th inst. His Lordship has been suffering from a severe attack of influenza; but we are glad to be able to announce that his usual good health is now completely restored.

The marriage of the Lady Emily Catherine Hay, second daughter of the Earl of Listowel, with Mr. J. W. Becher, second son of the late Sir William Becher, Bart., was solemnised at the parish church of Comberemere, on Wednesday last.

The Right Hon. B. Disraeli and Mrs. Disraeli have arrived at Grosvenor-gate, from Hughenden Manor, Bucks.

ROYAL VISIT TO WINDERMERE.—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Colonel Cavendish and suite, arrived by the train from the south on Monday last, on a short visit to the English Lakes. The Royal party proceeded immediately to Ullask's Royal Hotel, Bowness, where all preparations, according to previous notice, were in readiness for the Royal reception. The Royal visitors viewed the various objects of interest in the vicinity, amongst which they visited the museum, where the youthful Prince examined various specimens of minerals and objects of antiquity with remarkable minuteness and interest. The Royal party left the hotel the following morning, and proceeded up Windermere Lake in a small boat to the watershed, where the proprietor of the Royal Hotel had several ponies and one carriage waiting their arrival to convey them through other parts of the district. The Royal visitors seemed to enjoy the beautiful and romantic character of the country, and expressed themselves highly pleased with the lake and mountain scenery of Windermere.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS.

LORD RADSTOCK.

THE Right Hon. GRANVILLE GEORGE WALDEGRAVE, second Baron Radstock, of Castlerosa, Queen's county, in the Peerage of Ireland, Vice-Admiral of the Red, and C.B., died on the 11th instant, at his town house, 25, Portland-place. His Lordship was eldest son of Vice-Admiral Sir William Waldegrave, first Baron Radstock, who was the younger brother of George, fourth Earl Waldegrave, and who, in consequence of the important victory he gained, on the 14th of February, 1797, over the Spanish fleet off Cape Lagos, was created an Irish peer, under the title of Baron Radstock, on the 29th of December, 1800. The first Lord Radstock married Cornelia, second daughter of David Van Lennep, Esq., Chief of the Dutch Factory at Smyrna, and died the 20th Aug., 1825. He was succeeded by the second Lord, the subject of this notice, who was born the 24th September, 1789, and was an officer in the Royal Navy, where he displayed great zeal and courage. He did good service off the coasts of Italy in 1810, and he took an important part in the destruction of the French batteries at the mouth of the Rhone in 1812. He was, in 1815, made a Companion of the Bath, and was subsequently promoted to the rank of Aide-de-Camp to her Majesty. He became a Vice-Admiral of the Red in 1851. His Lordship's unostentatious charity and active exertions in many of the leading societies and benevolent institutions of the metropolis will long be remembered. He married, the 7th August, 1823, Esther Caroline, youngest daughter of the late John Puget, Esq., of Totteridge Park, Herts; by whom (who survives him) he leaves an only son, Granville Augustus William, born in 1833, now the third Baron Radstock, and two daughters, Elizabeth Cornelia, and Caroline Esther: the latter of these ladies is the wife of Captain Thomas William Beauchamp Proctor, eldest son of Sir William Beauchamp Proctor, Bart., of Langley Park, in Norfolk.

THE will of the late Sir Compton Domvile, Bart., of Santry House, near Dublin, and of Grosvanor-square, has been recently proved in Ireland and England under the respective amounts of £200,000 and £35,000.

ITALIAN ART.—A very interesting collection of Italian works of Art, of which the Berlin journals speak very highly, has recently been placed for exhibition in the Royal Academy in that city, by Mr. A. Gatti, of Florence. The collection fills three rooms, and consists of works in alabaster and various sorts of marble, from the finest Carrara to the dark-coloured blue and green marble, and the almost transparent Italian agate; the articles being Pompeian, Etruscan, and Neapolitan vases, splendid candelabra, statues from the antique, and sculptured copies of ancient paintings in some of the most celebrated galleries of Europe. Among the most remarkable figures are a "Boy playing with a Dove," "Venus Bathing," and a statuette of "Love," a beautiful youth sleeping

THE "VANDERBILT."—It may be recollected that during the summer of 1853 Mr Vanderbilt, with his family, made a cruise on board his steam-ship yacht North Star, in the European waters. That ship has since been successfully employed in ocean service, and Mr. Vanderbilt, by a letter from New York, dated April 29th, was about to resume his New York, Southampton, and Havre line, starting his new steamship Vanderbilt for Havre via Southampton, on May 5. In this enterprise he stands alone, and without Government aid, competing with many rival lines all subventionised to carry ocean mails at pay of from £3,500 dols. up to 19,750 dols. per voyage.

Twenty-four ships of the sunken fleet have already been raised in the harbour of Sebastopol. The American company is straining every nerve to fulfil its engagements, and hopes to raise the ships still remaining under the water. The steamer Abercos, one of those already raised, is plying as she used to do in the Black Sea before the war

DEPARTURE OF H.R.H. PRINCE ALBERT FROM ABNEY HALL, NEAR MANCHESTER.

THE ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION AT MANCHESTER.

In our Journal of last week we recorded the impressive ceremony of the opening of the Art-Palace at Manchester, on the 5th inst. We now engrave the principal points of interest in the Royal visit, commencing with the sumptuously-appointed seat of the Mayor of Manchester, who was honoured with the sojourn of his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

Abney Hall is situated on the Cheshire side of the stream about half a mile distant from it. The grounds in which the building stands, although not very extensive, are laid out in the most tasteful manner. There are terraces, shrubberies, grottoes, and gardens, with waterfalls and small lakes, which, while they afford variety and pleasure to the eye, give an appearance of much greater extent to the land surrounding the house. It is a fine Gothic structure, in the Early Tudor style, built of red brick, relieved by white stone; the architects being Messrs. Travis and Magnall, of Manchester. The principal entrance to the building faces the north; and the hall, of admirable proportions, is formed of richly-carved oak. The ceiling is of oak, in richly-ornamented panels, bearing in the cornice the hospitable motto—"Welcome the coming—speed the parting guest." The floor of the hall is of encaustic tiles, of a mediæval style of ornament. The dining-room is one of the finest rooms of the kind in the country; the ceiling is formed of square panels; and on a light-blue ground, forming the centres of very tasteful rosettes, are the initial letters of the different members of the Mayor's family. The mouldings forming the panels are of carved oak, relieved with gold, light maroon, and delicate white and scroll ornament. The walls are of a rich crimson colour, and the frieze or border is formed of a bronze coloured ground, marked with maroon-coloured lines, inscribed upon which are a series of mottoes in the mediæval character, the initial of each sentence being an illuminated capital letter. The furniture of the room is of massive carved oak, in keeping with the prevailing style of decoration of the room. The chimneypiece is of Caen stone, and of the same character as regards style as the furni ture, decorated in gold and various colours. There are some excellent paintings on the walls, by Frank Goodall, Stanfield, Miller ("Island of Rhodes"), Rine ("Lake of Zurich"), Tennent, Webster, Collins ("Blackberry Gatherers"), Cooke, Cooper, and Creswick.

The mansion is unquestionably one of the most princely in the neighbourhood of Manchester.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCE AT THE EXHIBITION BUILDING.

Prince Albert, with the members of his suite, left Abney Hall for the Exhibition at one o'clock. Two of the State carriages conveyed his Royal Highness, with the Marquis of Abercorn, Viscount Torrington, General Grey, Colonel Ponsonby, and Sir C. Seymour. Mr. Watts (the Mayor), and the High Sheriff of the county, in their private carriages, preceded his Royal Highness, and his escort was formed of a squadron of the 7th Dragoon Guards. The drive to Manchester from Cheadle is a pleasant one of six or seven miles, through a succession of the small and happy-looking villages and hamlets of Didsbury, Withington, Fallowfield, and Rusholme, which adjoins the great manufacturing city. Along the whole of the road traversed by the cortège, rustic arches and homely demonstrations of welcome were exhibited. There was nothing in the scenery to indicate the proximity of a huge manufacturing city. The elegant villas and mansions which dotted the road sides, and the clean and salubrious looking brick cottages, with their small plots of garden in the front, were seen instead of the giant sweep of huge brick wall, with tiers upon tiers of monotonous looking windows, tall chimneys vomiting forth their clouds of smoke, and the intricate lanes and squalid courts where reside a large portion of the factory workers of Manchester. Through this portion of the journey the illustrious visitor made rapid progress. Arrived at the city boundary, the modest cortège of four carriages was greatly increased. The remaining squadrons of the 7th Dragoon Guards, and a long array of carriages conveying the members of the municipality of Manchester, joined the procession. The clerks of Lords Mayor of London and Dublin, and the Sheriffs of London (Messrs. Mechi and Keats), were there with their gorgeous equipages and glittering carriages; and many a loyal Lancastrian, ignorant that green or blue was no livery of an English Prince, gave to the Mayors and Sheriffs the honours designed for a higher personage. The procession passed slowly up the Oxford-road, and arrived a few minutes after two o'clock at the Exhibition. The broad green—a space in front of the building—was covered with a dense mass of spectators; on the side of the road temporary stands were erected for the accommodation of visitors, and high prices were readily paid for the chance of seeing the Prince. Unfortunately for the great mass of the spectators, the coldness of the weather prevented the Prince from riding in an open carriage, and very few persons had the gratification of seeing his Royal Highness. Several companies of the 25th Regiment kept the ground, and formed a guard of honour. A Royal salute was fired on the arrival of the Prince, the band played the National Anthem, the assembled thousands cheered loudly, and the demonstration was one which evidently afforded gratification to his Royal Highness. The Engraving given at page 453 represents the arrival of the Prince.

THE OPENING CEREMONY.

His Royal Highness was welcomed at the Exhibition by many with whom he was personally acquainted and some who had been associated with him in carrying out the Exhibition of 1851. Earl Granville, the Earl of Carlisle (the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), the Duke of Newcastle, the Duke of Argyll, Lord Stanley of Alderley, Sir Benjamin Hall, Mr. Massey, and the Hon. Mr. Lowper were there to represent her Majesty's Government. Lord Overstone (the President of the Council), the members of the Executive Committee, and Mr. J. C. Deane (the General Commissioner), represented the promoters and directing bodies of the Exhibition; while Manchester had deputed its Mayor and Municipal Council to congratulate the Prince on the occasion of his visit. These sentiments were embodied in the address, and presented to the Prince. Then commenced the procession down the centre of the great hall, through the treasures contained in the Museum of Art— between elegantly-dressed ladies, who in graceful curtseyings and with smiling eyes expressed their respectful homage to the consort of their Sovereign; while the rougher sex, heeding not the well-known strains of the National Anthem, by Mr. Hallé's band, welcomed him with those spontaneous cheers never heard save on British soil.

Little, indeed, did the Prince see of those treasures of art which Messrs. Waring, Chaffers, and Redford had laboured so continuously to arrange in their cases, and to have all in order by the opening day; and the Gallery of Euphrosyne, the tearful face of the sinning Peri, the startled look of Eve at the sight of the little dead bird at her feet, or the playfulness of Ino and Bacchus, and fifty or more exquisite sculptured works, were passed rapidly, for the repeated of a State ceremonial admits of no obstruction, and Lily-livelihoods as they were, or pose in the glittering cavalcade, are as powerless as the masterpieces of the sculptor to win even a momentary admiration. Arrived at the dais, which was raised on a platform in the centre of the Transept, the band and chorus commenced the Anthem, while Prince Albert surveyed with delight the exciting scene before and around him.

But the Anthem having concluded, the Prince must descend from the realms of poetry to that most prosaic of all forms—the reception of addresses. First, Lord Overstone, on the part of the Council, thanked his Royal Highness for attending to inaugurate the Exhibition; and concluded with him on the lamented death of the Duchess of Gloucester (The address and reply of the Prince were given last week) Mr Fairbairn, the Chairman of the Executive Committee, wearing the uniform of a Deputy Lieutenant, next presented the address from the Executive Committee. (The View at pages 452-453 is taken at the moment when this address was presented to his Royal Highness.)

INAUGURATION OF THE STATUE OF HER MAJESTY.

On the day following the opening of the Exhibition Prince Albert attended at Peel Park for the purpose of inaugurating the fine colossal statue of her Majesty, by Mr. Noble (of which an Engraving was given last week).

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 16, 1857.

THERE can be no doubt as to the result of the new measure for the admission of Jews to Parliament, which has been introduced to the House of Commons by Lord Palmerston. It is understood that, this time, the question is a Ministerial one, which it ought to have been made before; and that, if defeated upon it, the Ministry will retire from office. The members of the House of Lords who have alone impeded the passing of similar measures in previous Sessions will hesitate plus time to imperil the peace of the country by persistence in the obscurative policy which they have hitherto pursued, not so much from their own strength as from the cowardice and weakness of the friends of the Jews. The House of Commons has four times opened its door for the admission of Baron Rothschild, four times elected as the representative of the city of London, and four times the House of Lords has shut it in his face. If again excluded, the Baron has pledged himself to the electors to resign his seat, and the electors have pledged themselves to the Baron to return him a fifth time. These pledges will be redeemed. How long can such an unseemly contest be allowed to continue? The consciences of those members of the Upper House who have so successfully resisted the wishes of the House of Commons and the people on this point may be at rest as to their own share in the transaction. They have done enough for conscience' sake, and need not any longer contend against an overpowering necessity. The House of Lords claims to be the sole judge of its own privileges. It indignantly resisted the introduction of Lord Wensleydale to its benches, because it deemed its rights, its privileges, and the vital principles of its constitution, to be attacked or imperilled by the proposed creation of life peerages. The House of Commons will, if expedient, imitate the example, and declare itself the sole judge of its own rules, privileges, and constitution. In this case the inconvenient, if not scandalous, spectacle would be presented to the world of two of the great estates of the realm in a free country contending for the mastery. In such a contest the House of Lords must know that it would be hopeless to expect victory; and should fear that defeat would not be unaccompanied by the penalties of loss of character, or loss of substance, which in all wars and conflicts whatever the defeated are certain, sooner or later, to be compelled to pay. But Lord Palmerston's measure, aided by his determination to carry it, will, there is every reason to hope, incline the Lords to confirm the decision of the Commons, and thus end peacefully and satisfactorily a conflict which has already lasted too long. It is true wisdom to know when to yield; and of this wisdom the House of Lords, on several much more trying and important occasions, has shown that it is not deficient. That House stands deservedly high in public estimation, and it will not forfeit its character for prudence and patriotism by carrying on a contest which the House of Commons, backed by the city of London and the majority of the people, will once more prove to be useless.

We regret that the great question of popular education, as it affects, or may affect, the criminal statistics of the country, has not been elevated into the rank of a Ministerial measure. Having been left to be dealt with by independent members of Parliament, it will, as a necessary consequence of the actual state of parties, be allowed to make little or no progress this year. Yet Mr. Adderley's Industrial School Bill, which is in substance identical with the bill introduced last Session by the same gentleman, and having for its objects the prevention of crime, might well have been adopted by a Government which expresses such anxiety to deal with the question of transportation and punishment. The principle of Mr. Adderley's Bill was supported by a majority of 177 against 18, which shows that the Government had encouragement to deal with the subject had it been so disposed. Sir George Grey's Transportation and Penal Servitude Bill, urgent as it may be, is scarcely so urgent as the question raised by Mr. Adderley. To prevent crime—if legislation can do so—ought to be the first duty of a wise and Christian Government. To punish crime is a task that unwise and even savage Governments find no difficulty in accomplishing. It is a task that never ends, and one which we fear will continue to grow more hopeless and heartbreaking until the Government shall begin at the right end of the subject. When the State shall act the part of parent to the neglected children of the destitute and vicious, from whose teeming numbers the great Army of Crime is continually recruited, there will be something like a reasonable hope that the questions of transportation, penal servitude, and all other kinds of reformatory punishment will cease to be the perplexity and scandal of our civilisation. At present the State, either by its apathy, or by its suffering the unseemly quarrels of rival sectarians to paralyse its exertions, fosters or creates crime among the lowest strata of its population, and, when Crime rides rampant and alarms Society for its safety or its property, it makes bad laws to punish that which good laws might have prevented; and spends in prisons, hulks and penitentiaries thrice the money which it would have cost in books, teachers, schoolhouses, and workshops to convert three out of every four of its existing criminals into industrious and honest members of the community.

Sir George Grey's Transportation Bill has already reached the second reading, and is substantially the bill introduced by the same busy functionary during the last Session. The terror created some months ago by the prevalence of garotte robberies, and by the outrages—often very grossly exaggerated in the newspapers—said to have been committed by ticket-of-leave men, no doubt impelled the Home Secretary to action on this subject. The principal feature of the proposed measure is to abolish transportation as a sentence to be passed by the Judges, but to leave it to the discretion of the Home Secretary to transport criminals after sentence. Whether the country or Parliament will be content to leave this power in the hands of the Minister remains to be seen. The means by which it is proposed to attain this result is to substitute, in all cases, sentences of penal servitude for sentences of transportation; the period of penal servitude being extended to the full limit of the old sentences of transportation. At present, if a criminal be sentenced to fourteen years' transportation, it means, not that he shall be transported, but that he shall undergo penal servitude for a term considerably less than fourteen years. The bill of Sir George Grey will remove this element of uncertainty from our criminal proceedings, and is so far entitled to support and approbation. But here the satisfaction of many persons with the proposed bill will end; for the Government proposes to place the whole of the persons convicted and sentenced under its provisions at the entire mercy and control of the Home Secretary. A man sentenced to penal servitude may be transported, at the discretion of Sir George Grey or his successors, to Western Australia, or to any other colony that wants, or will consent to receive, our criminal population; or he may be consigned to a home prison—to Dartmoor, to Woolwich, to Portsmouth, or any other place that may be afterwards selected for the purposes of punishment or reformation. The questions for consideration are—Whether the Home Secretary can safely be entrusted with such powers? whether his hands are not too full already? and whether such a scheme is not part of a still grander scheme for the concentration into one office of an amount of authority suited only to a despotic and autocratic form of government? We do not offer as yet any decided opinion on these points; but trust that the bill will be jealously watched by the representatives of the people through all its future stages. Yet we must own that we should look with more cordiality upon the bill if it had been accompanied by a measure having for its object the prevention of crime among the juvenile population, either in the manner proposed in Mr. Adderley's bill, or by some other as effective. If Justice have the Sword or the Scourge in one hand, she ought to have the Book in the other. If she punish the old and the incorrigible, she ought at the same time to prevent the contamination of the young. There is here a great field for the statesmanship and the generous ambition of the new men in Parliament. Shall the question of Popular Education never have its Bright or its Cobden? We trust that it will; and in the mean time we hope that Sir George Grey's bill will be thoroughly considered in all its bearings. The subject is highly important, no doubt; but it does not press more urgently than the promised Reform Bill or the question of Education.

"TOWN" AND "COUNTRY."

CLORINDA.

Dear Daisy! when thy perfect face,
Those hazel eyes, that hair of brown,
I see, I feel thou shouldst have place
Among the fairest of the town.

I think how happy is the sun
To leave its kisses on thy cheek;
Whilst to imprint there only one
A thousand beaux their hearts would break.

Thy step so light that 'neath thy feet
The grass and daisies scarcely yield,
Or seem to bow as though to greet
The passing fairy of the field.

How wouldst thou in the graceful dance
Move as the spirit of the ball,
And by each motion and each glance
Some "fine puss gentleman" enthral!

Or at the drum, the rout, the play,
Become the idol of the hour;
Fly these dull scenes then! Come away,
And reign, thy beauty gives the power.

DAISY.

Ah! what would be my nut-brown face
Beside thine own transparent cheek,
Through which the rosy blood doth chase:
Ah! how it flushes as I speak!

To lure the rover in his flight
Thy lips like crimson buds were made;
But mine, like flow'rs that bloom at night,
Unheed'd five—unheeded fade!

I covet not the courtly hall;
Give me the pleasant village green;
To thee I leave the stately ball,
While of the May-dance I am Queen.

So long as I've my rustic birds,
My beauteous flow'rs, my purling streams,
The sweetest songs are only words,
The brightest shows but worth ess dreams.

Go then, dear cousin, fare thee well!—
And lend new beauty to the Town;
Whilst polished beaux confess thy spell,
I'll rest contented with a clown.

EXHIBITION OF THE PICTURES OF THE LATE MR. T. SEDDON.

In the great Council-room of the Society of Arts, in the Adelphi, so magnificently adorned by the genius of Haydon, are to be exhibited for a few days some pictures which present the most extraordinary contrast conceivable to the works of that self-devouring genius, not only in subject but in treatment and intention. These pictures are not allegorical; they are not imaginative at all; they do not even seem at being picturesque. Not they have the first and the deepest interest, and the greatest estimable value of being perfectly truthful. We are not partisans of either side in the controversy of the day touching the kind or degree of strict imitation of nature proper to a picture. We do not, therefore, find it impossible or even difficult to appreciate the old and the beautiful, at the same time acknowledge the value of works like those of Mr. Seddon, which carry the conviction so irresistibly with them of utter and absolute fidelity to fact—of having rendered every thing exactly as it was seen at the particular time when painted and of having rendered that alone. Reality has, of course, its marvels, but the interest in them is not the whole history of art. Seddon's single-minded noble Artist-life put it out to our reckoning that these works are the first perfect expression of an entirely new thought in art, that we thus dwell upon a novelty. But publicity is a very indefinite term, but if one of its first principles be to give an absolute transcript of visible facts, then these works possess, we certainly most legitimate, examples. We all recognise the value of photography in landscape, (and we are no doubt behind it for these very pictures). Why, then, should we grudge to acknowledge the merit of works which give us far more truth, but of the same kind as that of photography—even if we were to go so far as to deny that they are works of art at all, in the received sense of the word. The topographical accuracy of these landscapes, in which nothing is omitted, nothing altered, nothing neglected, would be possibly thrown away upon a simple, homely view; but when this thorough portraiture is employed upon a scene of the grandest historical interest and the most sacred associations, as in the picture of Jerusalem here exhibited, then the value of a representation upon which so many associations decument, becomes evident. We have by itself in Oxford Street.

The circumstances which led to this exhibition are these. The last three or four years only of Mr. Seddon's life were spent in working out his original idea. Public attention was, however, forcibly drawn to him last year by an exhibition of these pictures, which he opened himself. He met with so much encouragement that he was induced to set out in the autumn of last year for Egypt and the Holy Land—the scenes of his former labours—but he had scarcely reached Cairo when death cut short a career from which high results might have been expected. So much sympathy was felt for his untimely death and for those he left behind, that a subscription was raised to purchase Mr. Seddon's principal work, the oil-picture of Jerusalem, from his widow at the price of 400 guineas, for presentation to the National Gallery, and an arrangement was made for the present exhibition and sale of his works.

Our space will not permit a detailed examination, but we may mention that besides the chief picture, the "View of Jerusalem, with the Valley of Jehoshaphat," which we have about alluded to, the following are the most important works, viz., "Mount Zion," "The Pyramids of Ghizeh" (two views, the smallest for sale), "The Marabout's Tomb, Cairo," "The Great Sphinx," "Arab Prayer at Sunset" (which, unhappily, the artist did not live to finish), and several others, with Eastern figures, camels, &c., inclining to the style of Mr. John Lewis. There are also a great number of very interesting Oriental sketches and memoranda. The oil-picture, "A View at Dinan, Brittany," we must especially mention, for its wonderful daylight effect and obvious exactitude; it is verily nature at first hand. The treatment of the water in a "View on the Wye" will also repay attentive examination. The only work of imagination, "Penelope," is, strange to say, as remarkable for its poetic feeling as for its natural truth.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

CHESTER was not very prolific in Derby results, and Strathnaver, with Bamby on him, settled the hopes of some Derbyites—Loyola and Commotion, to wit, in the Dee. Wardersmarke got disappointed for the second time this year, so the line between Skirmisher and Strathnaver is anything but perfect. Lord Zetland's horse, however, keeps steadily at the head of the betting, both in the Derby and Ascot Cup; and M.D., despite his Curé blood has many Wantage supporters. The trainer of Loyola learned no wisdom from the T.Y.C. style of his running in the Two Thousand, and actually tried to cut his Dee horses down. Stranger still, in the teeth of such evidence, Anton, who could only manage to scramble in a head in front of the black at Newmarket, is a good Derby favourite whereas there does not seem the least rational probability of his being among the first five. Saunterer is "coming" at last, but there is a great deal of uncertainty as to what this movement means. The Harpenden meeting is fixed for Friday, and the Bath and Somerset meeting comes off on Tuesday and Wednesday. Judging from the somewhat feeble list, its chief interest will be its Derby "knockings out," which are generally of as decisive a character as those at Warwick were to the St. Leger favourites in the coaching days.

George Dockeray, Mr. Greville's late trainer, died at Newmarket last week. He once rode for George IV., but his height made wasting a very toilsome affair, and he was obliged to give it up, about five-and-twenty years ago. Since then he has trained at Epsom, which place he quitted with great regret at Mr. Greville's bidding, in 1853, for Newmarket. In preparing steeplechases he was also very successful, and he rode old Lottery as a hack for a time after his steeplechase career closed. His Epsom saddle triumphs consisted in winning the Derby on Laydog, and the Oaks on Green Mantle. Kingston's subscription is quite full, and thirteen of his yearling stock are for sale among the Eltham Park yearlings on June 3rd. The proportion of fillies among the Royal yearlings is very great this year, and remarkably few of them are by Orlando.

Lord W. Powlett's proposition to have another long-distance race at Newmarket has been carried, but the Jockey Club seem to have shown monstrous little judgment in making it a race over the Bacon. The three-mile Portland Handicap is the one they ought to have revived, if they wished to see the stout horses come to the fore, as Venison was wont to do in the good old Duke's days. As it is, trainers dislike the course; and, as nearly every valuable horse that has run over it has been broken down, we cannot wonder at their feeling. It was positively painful last year to see even Fandango finishing in front of Homily.

Tom Dawkins has been selected as huntsman to the South Oxfordshire (which passed from Mr. Phillip's into Lord Macclesfield's hands), and not the South Berkshire. "Bob" Ward, Lord Southampton's well-known first whip, has quite recovered from his broken ribs, and has been made huntsman to Lord Dacre's hounds, in the place of Simkins. Boothroyd is also, we understand, about to leave the Quorn; and John Tredwell, who lately hunted the Essex under Mr. H. Greaves, has got the appointment. His father is huntsman to Mr. Farquharson; and his uncle Charles, who is still with the Bramham Moor, hunted the Quorn in Lord Suffield's time. Dinmore, from the New Forest, succeeds Thomas Webb with the Blackmoor Vale; and it is said that Mr. G. Cook has taken the Craven country. The rumour of Sir G. Wombwell and Mr. Craven hunting the Cottesmore country conjointly has died away, and Lord Middleton's name has been whispered—we know not on what authority. Mr. Drake's hounds are still, we believe, at Cottesmore; and 254 gs. was the highest price realised at the sale of the stud. The hounds brought the average for the best four or five lots.

Cricket is beginning in earnest, and Cambridge opens the ball on Parker's Piece on Monday, with a match between gentlemen and twenty-two of Stourbridge and neighbourhood, to play on the Ground of the Cricket Club. Mr. A. E. Knox and their whole eleven, the two Lockes, who form the whole of the professional brigade, and two boys, are down for Monday. East and West Sussex enter the field against each other at Brighton.

PAUPER SCHOOL UNION. On Monday evening the annual meeting of the friends and supporters of the Ragged School Union was held at Exeter Hall, under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury. The annual report of the Union was read, and showed that the number of ragged schools in connection with the Union had increased during the year from [illegible] to [illegible], and the number of children in attendance at them from [illegible] to [illegible]. The total amount of receipts during the year amounted to £7,242. The expenditure, including the grants to the ragged schools, had amounted to £6,852, leaving a balance in hand of £392. The meeting was addressed by Lord Ebrington, Lord Ashley (who was introduced by the chairman as one of "Lord Shaftesbury's boys") Dr. Cumming, and other gentlemen.

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH OUR CRIMINALS?—Such is the title of a lecture which Mr. Thomas Hodgkin proposes to deliver in St. Martin's-hall on Wednesday next; and, as he has studied that important question thoroughly, he will, no doubt, be able to give an interesting answer to the query he has put.

CRIME IN NAPLES.—Robberies with violence to the person have been much more frequent of late. One sad case occurred a few evenings since in the Riviera di Chiaia. Shots were predicted on occasion of the illumination of the three convents. The time of the commencement of the queen. The policy of the Government is to keep in chains or imprison as great as guilty of thought, and to loosen the common thief. Our streets are filled with beggars by day who play the part of thieves at night. The police does not protect them, but reserves its wrath for those who come out of evening to play the part of Providence to their country. The case to which I allude is this:—A [illegible] man who was taking a stroll through the Riviera di Chiaia on Wednesday night. On a sudden he was attacked by a man, whom he knocked down; two or three other ruffians then came up, but were knocked down or driven off not however, before they had inflicted a wound with a knife upon the temporal artery and kicked the Englishman severely in the side. He now lies in imminent danger, and prayers were offered up for his recovery yesterday morning. This is one of many similar cases which have occurred lately, one of which I reported to you. In the case I saw the knife which had been wrested from the hand of the assassin; its point was turned by striking against a case in the breast-pocket.—Letter from Naples, May 4.

MUSIC.

THE production of "Lucia di Lammermoor" at HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE on Thursday (last week) was the most remarkable occurrence at this house since the first appearance of Mdlle. Piccolomini last season. Her performance of Lucia was so superior to any of her previous efforts—not excepting "Traviata," popular as this has been—that it placed her in a new light, and showed her to be possessed of powers which she had not before exerted. She had, indeed, captivated the town from the very first; but even those who were charmed found themselves at a loss to define the nature of the charm; for her singing, though often delicious, was far from finished; and her acting, though intelligent and truthful, did not show any remarkable originality of genius. It began, therefore, to be suspected that when she came to essay a part demanding the higher powers of an artist she would sink under the burden. But the reverse has been the case. Lucia demands at once the talents of a great tragedian and an accomplished singer; and the young prima donna showed herself to be both. It was evident that she had been all but faultless to the arduous task; that she had conquered the difficulties of the music, and studied every feature of the character. The result was a vocal execution often as brilliant as Persiani's, and as expressive as Jenny Lind's; and an embodiment of Walter Scott's exquisite creation as natural, beautiful, and touching, as has ever been seen upon the stage. In short, Mdlle. Piccolomini in Lucia was, for the first time, a great actress and a great singer, because Lucia awoke those powers which had lain dormant in such trivial parts as the Traviata and the Figlia del Reggimento. Henceforward, we doubt not, her strength will rise with every successive demand upon it, and there is no triumph of her art to which she may not aspire.

Diugiam, too, created a greater sensation than he had ever done before. Donizetti's beautiful music displayed to the utmost advantage all the qualities of his exquisite voice, and the high artistic refinement and finish of his style. The impassioned and pathetic scenes of the drama enabled him, for the first time, to give full scope to his powers as a tragic actor. The natural moodiness of Edgar Ravenswood's character—which, as painted by Scott, furnishes a key to the incidents of the tale—histories of ungovernable fury, and the deep tenderness which, notwithstanding his violence of temper, lies at the bottom of his heart, were painted by this accomplished actor with equal force and delicacy, and bestowed on the character a stronger interest than we have ever seen given to it by any other performer. The striking part of Enrico (Ashton) has never been in better hands than those of Belletti, and Vialetti's feeling and intelligence in the character of the good priest gave an unusual degree of importance to the part.

That this opera, therefore, familiar as it is to the public, has met with an extraordinary degree of success is not surprising; for it has probably never been more powerfully and beautifully performed. Not only on the night of its first production, but on its subsequent representations, it has drawn enormous houses, and been received with acclamations. And it will, doubtless, be received in the same manner till the end of the season.

Alboni, on Tuesday, made her first appearance this season, as Rosina in the "Barbiere di Siviglia." Her well-developed form is not entirely suitable to the youthful Spanish maiden; but this defect of illusion, with genius such as hers is not much regarded, and soon wholly forgotten. She was attired, besides, with consummate taste; and her open, comely face and natural gaiety of manner made her a pleasant representative of the part. As to her singing, it was more enchanting than ever; it beggared all description, and placed rivalry out of the question. It is the very perfection of the vocal art—the pure Italian school in all its purity and beauty. We need scarcely add that her reception was enthusiastic. She was well supported by Reichardt, whose Count Almaviva evinces the talents of an accomplished musician and an intelligent actor. Beneventano played Dr. Bartolo with considerable humour; and in the Battle, but far from unimportant, part of Basilio Vialetti's success was remarkable. The whole opera—the most delightful of its class in the world—went off with unflagging spirit, and kept the crowded audience in a state of constant hilarity.

AT HER ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA the "Trovatore" is running a very successful course at present. It is unquestionably Verdi's masterpiece; and its attraction is heightened by the manner in which it is now cast. With Grisi as Leonora, Mario as Manrico, Graziani as the Count de Luna, and Didiée as Azucena the gipsy, the performance is magnificent, and draws crowds whenever it is announced. This was especially the case with its last representation, on Tuesday, when the house was overflowing, and the piece was received with acclamations. On Thursday there was the "Traviata," with Bosio in the part of Violetta, in which she has had immense success at St. Petersburg. We must defer till next week our notice of this appearance.

THE principal benefit concerts of the week have been Signor and Madame Ferrari's, on Tuesday evening, and the Misses Birch's, on Wednesday evening, both at the Hanover-square Rooms. Both concerts were attended, the soirées being deservedly favourites of the public. On both occasions the talents of many of our principal vocal and instrumental artistes were employed in performing ample selections of the most favourite pieces of the day.

MADEMOISELLE HERTHA DE WERTHEIM, prima donna of the Royal Opera in Stockholm, and the successor of Jenny Lind, has arrived in London for the season, and will make her first appearance at Madame Madeline Graver, and Mr. Goffrie's concert, at Exeter Hall, on Wednesday next.

THE THEATRES, &c.

ADELPHI.—A new and original three-act piece was produced on Monday, entitled "Joseph Chavigay, or, Under the Thumb." The hero of this drama belongs to the same class as "Janet Pride," whose representative Mr. Webster has been long proud of being regarded; and we therefore wonder not that a fresh character of the same type should have been proposed for his acceptance. Joseph Chavigny is, however, cast in a more ambitious mould. He is a criminal of good education. An opportunity arises for his extorting a sum of money from one who had been his friend in former years, and who had adopted his daughter as his own, replacing her for one he had lost, and passing her off as his own child on his wife, from whom he had concealed the death of their real offspring. His plan is to accuse the supposed father, M. de Varennes (Mr. Leigh Murray), of forgery, and fraudulently substituted it for the deceased girl, in order that the former might inherit an estate to which the latter would have been entitled had she lived long enough. The facts on which he depends are incautiously registered in an old letter, which the avaricious Chavigny threatens to produce, unless bribed to silence by the gift of five thousand pounds. His object, however is defeated by the statement having been overheard by the wife and daughter in question, who had been concealed behind the curtains of the boudoir; and, with the tableau of their discovery, the first act successfully concludes. At this point of the story the character of the substituted daughter becomes interesting. Madaline Ligny de Varennes (Madame Celeste) has a lover, Count Gerard de Chantimenil (Mr. Billington), and she is far too honourable to wed herself, now that she knows her origin, to the scion of a noble house. Her first plan is to inform the Count of the facts; but this M. de Varennes forbids, as it might involve her own ruin. She therefore resolves on disgusting Gerard by a display of objectionable manners and opinions, and for a time succeeds. She then induces M. de Varennes to comply with Chavigny's extortionate demand, and follows the latter to the Glen of Loup Noir, where he lurks with a companion as abandoned as himself, one Requin (Mr. Paul Bedford), a brutal villain, whose want of intellectuality habitually annoys his better-instructed mate. Madeline has an interview with her father in the glen. The latter declines to announce her intentions; but, on receiving the money without conditions, surrenders his doubts and, at last thoroughly melted, gives up unasked the document containing the fatal proofs. And now his own perils commence. Like a true scion of his class, and in observing which Requin, who subsequently, while he sleeps, robs him. Requin then gets drunk with brandy, and falls into a heavy slumber, during which Chavigny, unconscious of his loss, triumphs over him, and makes his escape from a left in an old mill, leaving the senseless brute to the mercy of the approaching gendarmes. Requin, however, wakes up in time, and also makes his escape. Chavigny is next seen flying from pursuit, but, finding himself safe in a forest-pass, congratulates himself on his prospects, and again takes out the valuable pocket-book to re-examine and enjoy its contents. At the height of his self-congratulations he opens the covers, to find them empty. Then follows a scene of despair and premeditated revenge. He leaves it to find Requin, alive or dead. Shortly after Requin appears, picks up the rejected pocket book in the pass, and follows to dispatch the wretched partner whom he has both betrayed and suspected of betraying himself. Unfortunately Chavigny falls in with his pursuers, and retreats into the drawing-room of the Maison de Varennes, where he is disowned by all concerned. Requin, too, is on his track, and shoots him from a distance, to be shot in his turn by the gensdarmes, who are on the spot. As the guilty Chavigny falls, poor Madeline exclaims to M. de Varennes (my father!" when M. de Varennes steps forward, finger on lip, to receive the ejaculation for himself. And with this singular tableau the new piece concludes. We have already mentioned the length of certain scenes, and might object that the dialogue wants condensation in places; but there is cleverness in the piece, but the evident purpose of the play atones for all smaller defects, and the extraordinary excellence of Mr. Webster's acting should obtain a prolonged hearing for it, as undoubtedly it secured its success on the first night. The farce is Mr. Watty Phillips.

PRINCESS'.—Mr. Kean has this week varied his bill, by the introduction of a new and successful farce, taken from the French of MM. Buyard and Varner, but freely and carefully Anglicised, so as to draw out whatever analogies may exist between the miseries of the proprietors of a large Parisian hotel and the English lodging-house keeper. The original vaudeville bore the title of "Habitez donc votre immeuble"—that of the present adaptation is "An Englishman's House is his Castle." Mr. Pocock, admirably acted by Mr. Harley, having let every available room in his domicile finds that he is no longer its master. One lodger will make love to his niece, another will carry on dangerous experiments with detonating powders, another will be jealous of the landlord's presumed attentions to his wife, and another will indulge in a little amorous intriguing, though much to the annoyance of others under the same roof; and none of these difficulties can be got rid of until legal notice has been given and the prescribed term expired. Our readers can imagine how Mr Harley would act under such circumstances, and will readily believe that his humour is irresistible. The tragedy of "Richard II." followed, and appears to be still attractive. Capitally performed and lavishly illustrated, it will undoubtedly long retain its hold on public encouragement.

An accident, that might have been fatal, took place on Wednesday evening at this theatre. The velvet curtain used in "Richard II.," on being raised before the fourth act of that tragedy, came into contact with some gaslights, and immediately took fire. Mrs. Keau showed on the occasion an extraordinary presence of mind, and, instantly advancing to the front of the stage, entreated the audience to keep their seats, as immediate means could be taken to extinguish the flames. A supply of water was promptly obtained, and the danger was soon over. The performance was, of course, suspended, and some of the performers' dresses spoiled; but the theatre was opened as usual on Thursday evening.

ROYAL SURREY GARDENS.—The directors of the Surrey Gardens will have strong reason to congratulate themselves if they obtain audiences throughout the season on a scale with that which filled the fine concert hall on Monday evening. That the immense audience assembled to hear music, and music alone, was amply proved by the fact that no other attractions were offered no fireworks, no "views," no more lamps even than were actually indispensable. No inconsiderable space was occupied by the band and the rest, which numbered about 1000 performers. Meyerbeer's Tedeum was the work selected to inaugurate the season the principal vocalists being Mrs. Weiss, Miss Vinning, Mrs. Lockey, Mr Weiss, and Mr Sims Reeves. The conductor was Mr Costa, Mr Sullivan also appearance in the orchestra was hailed with cordial and repeated applause. The choruses were given with spirit, and with vigour, and their steadiness and precision and in several instances a strong tendency to encore them was manifested. The performance of "Tedeum" was very creditable, and, under the direction of Mr Land, proved a most unequivocal success. Miss Vinning, whose voice has much improved since her singular début at Exeter Hall, sang the parts allotted to her with fine effect, and in more than one case received a demand for an encore. The same honour was awarded to Mrs. Lockey, in the touching air, "Rest in the Lord;" and to Mr. Sims Reeves, for his brilliant execution of "Then shall the righteous," which he was compelled to repeat. The trio, "Lift thine eyes," by Mrs. Weiss-Miss Vinning and Mrs. Lockey, was beautifully rendered, and, of course, encored. The performance concluded with the National Anthem, played by the band. The miscellaneous entertainments commenced on Tuesday, and will continue throughout the season. Among the novelties is a studio for photographic portraiture, which has recently been erected in the grounds by Mr. Henry Leslie.

Distant thunder heard at intervals on 11th from 2h. to about 7h

The daily means are obtained from observations made at 6h. and 10h a.m., and 2h., 6h., and 10h p.m. on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the Greenwich Tables. The "Dew-point" and "Relative Humidity" are calculated, from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers, by Dr. Apjohn's Formula and Dalton's Tables of the Tension of Vapour. The amount of the wind is given by a self-registering Robinson's Anemometer, the amount stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

A FUGITIVE BANKER.—The commercial community of this city were thrown into consternation yesterday by an event which is of very rare occurrence here. One of the partners of the banking-house of B. and Co. left his house clandestinely the night before last, taking with him shares and securities to the amount of 1,000,000 f. It is feared that a still larger deficit will be found in the accounts with foreign countries, with which the house did a very extensive business. The retreat of the fugitive has not yet been discovered, it is believed that he has succeeded in reaching Hamburg by railway, and thence embarked by one of the steamers which leave daily for England. This event will have a very disastrous effect on the fair, which is still going on, as a number of the foreign purchasers have letters of credit on the house in question.—Letter from Leipsic, April 30.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

HER MAJESTY, who never unnecessarily "enjoys the honours of a convalescent," and always evinces her good sense by seeking change of scene and fresh air as soon after her accouchement as her medical attendants will allow, is in the Isle of Wight, where her loyal subjects trust that her health will soon be thoroughly re-established, so that the Queen may be able to have her share in the pleasures of the season. A "flying" visit from the Grand Duke Constantine, at Osborne, will occupy her Majesty's leisure in the island. The Duke is still with the Emperor of the French, and, if report speaks truly, is by no means delighting the officials who come into contact with him. He is said to be as brusque, and even rude, in dealing with them, as he could be among his own serfs; and the Parisians are glad to revive the Napoleonic dictum about scratching a Russian and finding a Tartar. Le Nord has been getting into a scrape for publishing a ridiculous account of the amusements of the French Court at Villeneuve l'Etang, where the Emperor, the Empress, and the attendants are represented as having amused the Grand Duke by a sort of romping match up and down a mound the gentlemen hopping on one leg, and the ladies taking them prisoners. The whole story looks like a canard, but was intended mischievously, and the Nord has been seized for endeavouring to place the Court in a ludicrous light before the public eye.

Parliament has buckled to its work, though the Marquis of Blandford has actually begun to talk already about the Whitsuntide holidays Governmental measures have been introduced, in accordance with Mr. Hayter's undertaking. The Divorce Bill, substantially the same as that of last Session, is to be read a second time in the Lords on Tuesday—the Bishop of Oxford vainly asking postponement, and threatening opposition, if it is to be hoped, as vainly. The Transportation Bill is also that recently brought in, and provides that persons, now or hereafter under sentence of penal servitude, may be sent beyond seas at the discretion of Government. The Savings-banks Bill proposes to give a national guarantee for the security of the deposits, and, of course, to agree to certain control over the institutions to Government officials, without which it would be unreasonable to make the country liable. Among private measures which have been brought forward there is a bill by Mr Ludlow for enabling magistrates to inflict the punishment of flogging upon brutes who commit aggravated assaults upon women and children. Sir George Grey did not oppose the introduction of the measure, and it is difficult to say why an experiment in corpore vile, which can do no harm, and may prove very beneficial, should not be tried. The coward who commits this class of offence cares nothing for the humiliation of ordinary punishment, but is usually terribly afraid of physical pain. If such an Act should save but a dozen helpless creatures in the year from the brutality of ruffians, surely this money expended in whipping will have been mercifully laid out.

The Overland Mail brings the melancholy announcement that the chiefs of our land and sea forces in Persia, General Stalker and Commander Etheridge, Lad both died by their own hands. The verdicts of the inquisition in each case gave mental aberration as a reason for the deed, and the influence of the climate must be imagined to have predisposed the unfortunate gentlemen to the condition so described. There was nothing in the circumstances of either, so far as is known, to discompose his mind the expedition had been successful, and honours would have awaited those who had planned it. The sad news alloys the satisfaction with which the war and its three brilliant triumphs will be regarded by the country. The details of the last success, at Mohammerah, are interesting, and Sir James Outram has added to his reputation by the skill with which he conducted the attack. The Arab tribes were sending in submission and offers of assistance, when they saw which way victory went.

Lord Napier appears to have given much satisfaction to the Americans by his speech declaratory of the good feeling of England towards the States, and some of the newspapers affect to interpret his explanation as meaning on the part of America to mean a recognition of the right and duty of the States to civilise that is, to annex the Western continent, "as England is doing with Asia." In connection with this address, Lord Palmerston's statement on Tuesday has its value. His Lordship said that, in consequence of the violence in New Granada, sufficient force would be stationed on the coast of America for the protection of British interests, but this was being done with a friendly understanding between our Government and that of Mr. Buchanan, and the latter disclaimed any idea of asserting territorial rights on the part of New Granada.

Sir William Napier has encountered a more "unpleasant presence" (to adopt Mr. Disraeli's term) than his namesake. His arrogance, and excessive rudeness, and refusal to offer explanations, or apologise for the contempt he had shown to the civil authorities of Bombay, have called into the field a dangerous antagonist, who, coming from the scene of the Napierian feats, and being intimately acquainted with the whole subject, deals sledgehammer blows upon the crest of the Lieutenant-General. This is the editor of the Bombay Times, a gentleman of high character and abilities, Dr. Buist, who, after summarily refuting charges brought by Sir William in one of his last petulant fits, adds quietly that in his new volumes, in the portion relating to his Bombay career, about 800 pages, there is an average of two or three mis-statements per page, and that in February, 1845, he convicted Sir William of "three score deliberate mis-statements, knowingly made." Dr. Buist alludes to Sir William's "romances" as learned at an early age in India, though commanding attention in England. More damaging matter has been published in reply to certain "Home-like letter, against a then absent Minister," and in reply, as we learn, but will not be held responsible for the charges, overbearing Parrotle's swagger, "Thousands of pounds already make that be believed."

The case of the House of Lords was called on Monday, by Lord Campbell, for the judicial perusal of immoral publications in London. His Lordship's own attention had no doubt been invited to the subject by his having had to sentence a couple of the vilest of the species to two years' imprisonment—the one to three months, the other to a year of imprisonment. He wished for speedier means of repressing the evil. The Lord Chancellor contradicted the Lord Chief Justice as to the present power of the law, which the one great judicial luminary asserted to be sufficient, and the other to be insufficient, for the purpose. Setting aside this edifying "conflict of laws" between the highest authorities, let us express a hope that some stringent course will be adopted with regard to the venders of such poison. Mere fines for it are nothing, and imprisonment would be well if it were established that the trade of the great London thoroughfare—reeks with vileness. It reflects the utmost disgrace upon the whole of the parochial authorities clergy, churchwardens, and all that the Government should be compelled to assume a police which it has not the power to exercise. Lord Campbell says that the trade is carried on openly, and that "every man knows where it is to be found." Then why do not the parochial authorities, or the Government, know where the wickedness is perpetrated, but they are to rely on our speaking it. It the law be strong enough as Lord Campbell says why is it not enforced? Is it that the Government are afraid to act? Is it that the English reverend gentlemen of the parishes are afraid to act? Is it that the Government, and, in the mean time, it obtains would take the summary measures dictated by a sense of decency, and the preservation of the morals of the population forced to pass through these foul avenues thought to set summarily, for what must be done, but pay would give reckless agents in business and who, without Justice Overdo's warrant, shall dash a bottle of poison into the kennel? Lord Chief Justice Campbell deserves the gratitude of the public, and we trust he will follow up the crusade against abomination.

FALL OF THREE HOUSES IN TOTTENHAM-COURT ROAD

On Saturday morning last a shocking catastrophe took place in Tottenham-court-road, by which five lives at least have been lost, and a large amount of property destroyed. The history of the accident is only a fresh illustration of the very careless manner in which the officials appointed under the Metropolitan Building Act to watch over the pulling down of old and the erection of new houses perform their highly responsible duties. It appears that Messrs Maple and Co and Mr Hunter, two rival upholsterers, had pulled down the premises on their five houses in Tottenham-court-road. Messrs Maple owned Nos 145, 146, and 147; Hunter, Nos. 148 and 149. There had been a fire some little time back at Hunter's, necessitating repairs. As the new firm was putting itself in order, Mr. Maple seems to have thought the opportunity a good one to do some beautifying and enlarging on his own account. The works went on till Friday without interruption. People passing through the street thought the thing looked exceedingly perilous, and, shaking their heads, almost anticipated a crash. On Friday afternoon the district surveyor interfered. He is stated to have condemned the old party-wall of Maple's three houses, to have given directions that it should be underpinned, and that new brickwork should be put in from the ground floor to the first floor. He does not appear to have objected to the bowing water-stained beam of wood; but to have insisted on the ruins being taken down. At seven o'clock the workmen proceeded to carry them out by removing the old brickwork. At seven o'clock the party-wall gave way, and the whole mass came down with a rush into the street. Nos 145 and 146 were left standing, a tottering and disfigured wreck; Nos. 146, 147, and 148 lay a heap of bricks, beams, and mangled bodies in the street.

From fifty to sixty men were at work at the time, and some score or more of shopmen and others were sleeping or dressing at different parts of the house at the time of the accident. For some time after the house had fallen the men in the upper storey were unaware of the fact, the loud, rushing water-stream at both ends of the house drowning the noise of the crash. A young apprentice of Mr. Hunter's, named Thomas Bacon, a cabinet-maker, was in the act of washing himself in the back parlour of his master's house, when he was suddenly precipitated from the top of the house, with only a few slight scratches. All around the spot where he was found lay heaped up in strange confusion the ruins of the houses. The timbers, strengthened with iron, which carried the front of the houses, were snapped in the centre like thin laths of wood; girders and beams were snapped or mingled together in the strangest of forms; flooring boards were wrung from their joists; and sheets of lead, torn off like paper, rolled and curled up in the most curious shapes: lath and plaster, brick and mortar, doors and staircases, window-frames and cupboards, bedsteads, chairs, tables, and looking-glasses were smashed and broken and pounded up into shapeless mass. So sudden and astounding was the shock that the persons employed in the premises had no time to make their escape, and were buried in the ruins. Some were killed on the spot, others were taken to the hospitals, where they died of their wounds, and others were dug out alive, but more or less severely injured. Among the latter were Mr. Frederick Byng, chief clerk; James Bean, Reginald Rudd Horace Regnaut, George Bayley, George Bolton, Wm. Bean, Wm. Beauchamp, a youth who acted as cashier in one of the departments; Ann Briscoe, the cook, and Mary Daly, house-maid. Among those employed on the works, missing, were Mr. Taylor, jun., the son of the contractor for Mr Maple's works; Turner and Garn[illegible]ers and Geo. Keeble, one of the labourers in the employ of Mr Hunter. Of the party-wall on Mr. Hunter's side of the premises, the only body of men set to work soon succeeded in rescuing most of the above named, and they were conveyed in rapid succession, one after the other, to University College Hospital, where they were promptly attended to by the staff of the medical staff. After digging out the ruins for about three-quarters of an hour, the men succeeded in reaching the ruins body of the unfortunate young man Fredrick Byng. The poor fellow, who was found lying on his back, which had fallen with the upper floor, in which he had slept, had evidently been suffocated, as there was no mark of violence whatever upon his person.

Four other persons were found dead among the ruins Ann Briscoe, cook, Richard Turner, carpenter; George Barnett, carpenter, and Geo. Keeble, labourer. Of the persons taken to the hospitals, the only one dangerously wounded was Mr Joseph Taylor, son of the contractor, who died on Thursday morning, making the sixth life which has been sacrificed by this catastrophe.

ST PAUL'S AND ST. BARNABAS' CHURCHES, PIMLICO.—On Sunday the Lord Bishop of London preached an impressive sermon at St Paul's Church in aid of the new[illegible]. [illegible] the case of his predecessor, Bishop Blomfield, who, in the year of his consecration, had consented to the division of the parish of St Paul's, and in the silver church of that parish. The highest Court of Appeal had settled the matter in dispute, and there was now no further difficulty. The one change that the law enjoined had been effected, and the services carried on decently conducted. There was scarcely anything in the worship there, so far as he was cognisant, which differed from the service used in our cathedrals. Whether it was wise or expedient to introduce cathedral service into a parish church might be a question; but there, at least, owing to the happily large number of churches in the parish, those who objected to it would have no difficulty in finding places of worship elsewhere. But it would be very wrong to speak of the worship in the new church as one which was not in accordance with the Church of England. There might be things which some persons might wish altered, but he was sure that any one might worship at that church without having his attention distracted. In the sister church there was much more that he could assonably be objected to—much more that was liable to give offence and excite hostile feelings. As this was his belief, it was only fair that he should express it; and he trusted that his representations would lead to such changes as were called for by the spirit of brotherly love and dutiful obedience. He would say no more of these matters, but would call upon all to draw together in the Christian work of aiding the training of the young children in the duties of Christ ans, in the worship of Christ, and in love one to another.

RAGGED CHURCH AND CHAPEL UNION. The fourth annual meeting of this Union was held on Wednesday evening, in the lower room Exeter Hall; Mr J Ivatt Briscoe, M.P., the chairman of the committee, presiding. The society has thirty-two preaching stations, or ragged churches, with an average attendance of 2200 persons. In addition with these stations there are mothers' meeting, reading, and coffee rooms, cottage lectures, libraries for the adult readers, clothing clubs, and penny-banks, and sometimes even farthing banks. The committee, we learned the establishment of 1000 preaching-stations, and pointed out that its labours were not confined to the eastern localities or London, but extended even to the West-end, where there were thousands and tens of thousands of the poorer classes sunk in darkness. The receipts during the past year have been £2312s; and the expenditure £217 2s. 3d; leaving a balance in favour of the society of £94 18s. 9d.

ROYAL MEDICAL BENEVOLENT COLLEGE.—The annual general meeting of the governors of this institution was held on Tuesday last at the house in New-street, Co[illegible] Earl Manvers presiding over the College, in the chair. It appeared from the report which was read by the secretary that the College was making the most satisfactory progress, the school department being finished and completely occupied, and twenty pensioners' residences being ready for occupation. Fourteen of these are already filled, and six other pensioners, to fill the remainder, will be elected on the 21st inst., together with six more foundation students. The annual subscriptions during the past year amounted to £2769; the annual donations to £2856; and the special donations to the chapel fund to £2760. The proceedings, terminated with votes of thanks to the treasurer, to the auditors, and to the noble president of the College, who responded in a[illegible]

TRIAL OF BACON AND HIS WIFE FOR MURDER.—At the Central Criminal Court, on Wednesday last, Thomas Fuller Bacon, and Martha Bacon, his wife were charged with the wilful murder of the[illegible] Bacon, husband of the latter. [illegible] Mr. Bodkin and Mr. Ribton were counsel for the prosecution, and Mr. Ballantine and Mr. Parry for the prisoners. The indictment having been read to the prisoners they both pleaded not guilty, and a jury was then empannelled to try them. Mr. Bodkin who opened the case for the prosecution gave a[illegible] narrative of the facts and circumstances under which it was alleged the prisoners had committed murder in their house. The original statement of the mother it will be remembered, was that some person had entered the house, and, after murdering the two children, had endeavoured to cut her throat. After several examinations before the magistrate, however, she stated that her husband was the murderer, and he was accordingly taken in custody. The woman had been in a lunatic asylum during the previous summer, and had left it only two months before the murder. From the evidence it appeared that she was of unsound mind when it was committed. The case for the prosecution occupied the whole of Wednesday. The trial was resumed on Thursday. Mr Sergeant Ballantine addressed the jury on behalf of the prisoners, and Mr Metcalfe followed on behalf of the husband. Lord Campbell then summed up. The jury retired, and, after an absence of ten minutes, returned a verdict of "Not guilty" against Martha Bacon, and also a verdict of "Not guilty" against Martha Bacon on the ground of insanity. Lord Campbell said he entirely concurred in the verdict, and since he had been absent from court he had been informed that the female prisoner had confessed that she alone committed the murder. The other indictments were withdrawn. Immediately after Bacon's acquittal he was taken into custody by Mr. William Reed, the Chief Constable of Stamford, on the Coroner's inquisition, for the murder of his mother, a verdict of wilful murder having been returned against him.

CONSERVATIVE REFORM BILL.—The friends of Sir Bowyer Smyth, the defeated of South Essex, determined to show that they are not cast down, gave their hero a dinner last week, at Chelmsford. The "defeat, disgrace, and dishonour" is attributed to "the cheap clothes and cheap food of the[illegible]" Sir Bowyer Smyth in the course of his speech revealed the[illegible] of[illegible] party. He avowed that as soon as nothing would be done, but he[illegible] never[illegible] Reform Bill. Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill would be brought before the House of Commons, Mr Disraeli and John Russell and Lord Palmerston. The House of Commons would[illegible] and[illegible] up to the House of Lords. But in that House did its duty it would make it as sure like Mr. Disraeli as possible.

Arrangements are making in Australia for establishing a telegraphic communication between Melbourne and Adelaide. When this communication is extended to King George's Sound, and the telegraph is established between England and Aden, news will reach London from Australia in twenty-two days.

It appears from the Mayo papers that the demand for potatoes for exportation to England is so great that the supplies at markets are quite unequal to the wants of the purchasers.

THE FUNERAL OF THE DUCHESS OF GLOUCESTER.

THE remains of the lamented Princess Mary, Duchess of Gloucester, were on Friday (last week) consigned to their last resting-place in St George's Chapel, at Windsor.

Although it was an avowed object of the funeral would be of a strictly private character, a large number of persons collected in the morning, along the line through which the body of her Royal Highness was to pass.

Shortly after nine o'clock the remains of the late Duchess were removed from Gloucester House to the[illegible] of the Great Western Railway at Paddington, and thence to the station of the Great Western Railway at Slough. At Gloucester House, at the terminus of the Great Western Railway at Paddington, and at the Slough station, [illegible] assembled to receive the[illegible] Paddington, and from the Slough station to St. George's station at Windsor, an escort accompanied the body. Several mourning-coaches, containing the pages, the chaplain, the medical attendants, the executors, and other officers of her Royal Highness's household, proceeded to the Paddington station; and these were followed by her late Royal Highness' state carriage, in which was the Duchess' coronet, borne upon a velvet cushion, by Colonel the Hon. Augustus Liddell Gardner, and attended by her[illegible] The[illegible] was drawn by eight horses, and the coffin which it contained was covered with rich silk crimson Genoa velvet, studded with gilt furniture. A double row of burnished gold nails formed the outline, and the compartments were formed by a tripled row of small nails. The sides were relieved by massive gold handles, and the corners were of the same, ornamented by an engraved coronet. The lid in the upper compartment had a large raised coronet, and in its lower division an inverted torch and extinct serpent. Her Majesty's carriage followed the hearse, and left the procession on its arrival at Paddington. Upon the arrival of the procession at Slough, it was joined by the Lord Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household, the Lord in Waiting to her Majesty, and the whole then proceeded from Slough to St. George's[illegible] Windsor. Following these state carriages[illegible] enjoying the members of her Majesty's Household, and the equerries and carriages of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge, and of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. [illegible] Duchess's medical attendants, Mr. Lampert, M.D., and Mr. Tudor, last but not least, the[illegible] being there in attendance.

Shortly after twelve o'clock the Duchess of Cambridge, with her illustrious daughter, was conducted into the chapel, and led to seats on the left side of the choir. The Prince Consort, with the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge, came shortly afterwards, and were led to[illegible] to the prosecution entering the[illegible] the Duchess of Atholl, Lady in Waiting to the Queen, who had been appointed to attend as chief mourner on the part of her Majesty, was conducted to the chapel. Lady Couper was in attendance on the Duchess.

The procession having reached the chapel, moved at a slow pace along the platform, the choristers chanting Dr. Croft's burial service. On reaching the choir the coffin was removed from the bier and placed upon tressels in the centre of the chapel, the coronet and cushion being deposited on the head of the coffin. The chief mourner took her seat at the head, and the pall-bearers sat on either side. The Lord Chamberlain, Lord[illegible] and the[illegible] and Colonel the Hon. A. Liddell, stood at the[illegible] The other mourners occupied adjoining seats.

When all had taken their places within the choir the 90th Psalm to Purcell's chant in G minor was performed. The Dean of Windsor then read the lesson, and then followed Handel's beautiful quartet anthem:—"When the ear heard her then it blessed her."

The Dean then read in a very impressive manner the[illegible] the opening of the vault.

The Dean then read in a very impressive manner that portion of the service commencing "Man that is born of woman hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery." After which the coffin was lowered, and the Dean continued the[illegible] prayer—"Forasmuch as it hath pleased Almighty God, of His great mercy, to[illegible] unto Himself the soul of our dear sister here departed." The choir then chanted "I heard a voice from Heaven, saying." After the Lord's Prayer the Second Anthem was beautifully sung—"Her body is buried in peace, but her name liveth evermore."

The blessing was next pronounced, and Garter King of Arms proclaimed over the grave the style of her late Royal Highness, with which the ceremony was brought to an appropriate conclusion.

The Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar left the chapel together. The Duchess of Cambridge and[illegible] remained some time absorbed in grief, and did not take their departure until the vault had finally closed over the last mortal remains of the Gloucester family.

The[illegible] was conducted by Mr. [illegible] of Windsor, whose experience in ceremonies of this character now includes no less than fourteen Royal interments, dating back to that of the Princess Charlotte.

NEW FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY AT NORWICH.

AN imposing structure has recently been erected in the capital of East Anglia, for the purposes of a Free Public Library and School of Art; and to afford extra accommodation, also, to the Norfolk and Norwich Museum, which is[illegible] in connection therewith.

The[illegible] has been very actively in the[illegible] and although the[illegible] Act obtained by Mr. W. Ewart, M.P., received the Royal assent in August, 1850, the first stone of the[illegible] was not laid until the[illegible] on the 19th of September, 1854, by Mayor Bignold, and[illegible] M.P. for the city, Viscount Bury, Sir[illegible] Bart., and Lord Overstone. The[illegible] was opened on Monday last. After the lapse of a few months, during which[illegible] the building for the purposes of accommodating the local School of Art: this, of course, involved some delay; and, from various causes, the library was not opened to the public[illegible] last Monday.

The style of the[illegible] is the Italian Roman Doric, the[illegible] being[illegible] and the[illegible] Italian. The Library and an adjoining apartment, appropriated to the Museum, are on the ground floor; and below are spacious vaults, which are devoted to trade purposes, and from which a considerable annual revenue is expected to be derived. Over the principal entrance is a well-executed head of Homer, and in the entrance-hall, which has a tesselated pavement, are four scagliola columns with Corinthian capitals. The museum-room is 54 feet in length and 26 feet wide, and the library is 44 feet long and 33 feet wide. A broad and handsome stone staircase conducts the visitor to the second floor, on which is a lecture-room of the same dimensions as the library, and two apartments appropriated to the Literary Institution, which are collectively of the same size as the museum beneath. On the third floor are two large rooms for the School of Art, with domed roofs and ample skylights, and four smaller apartments for classes are also provided.

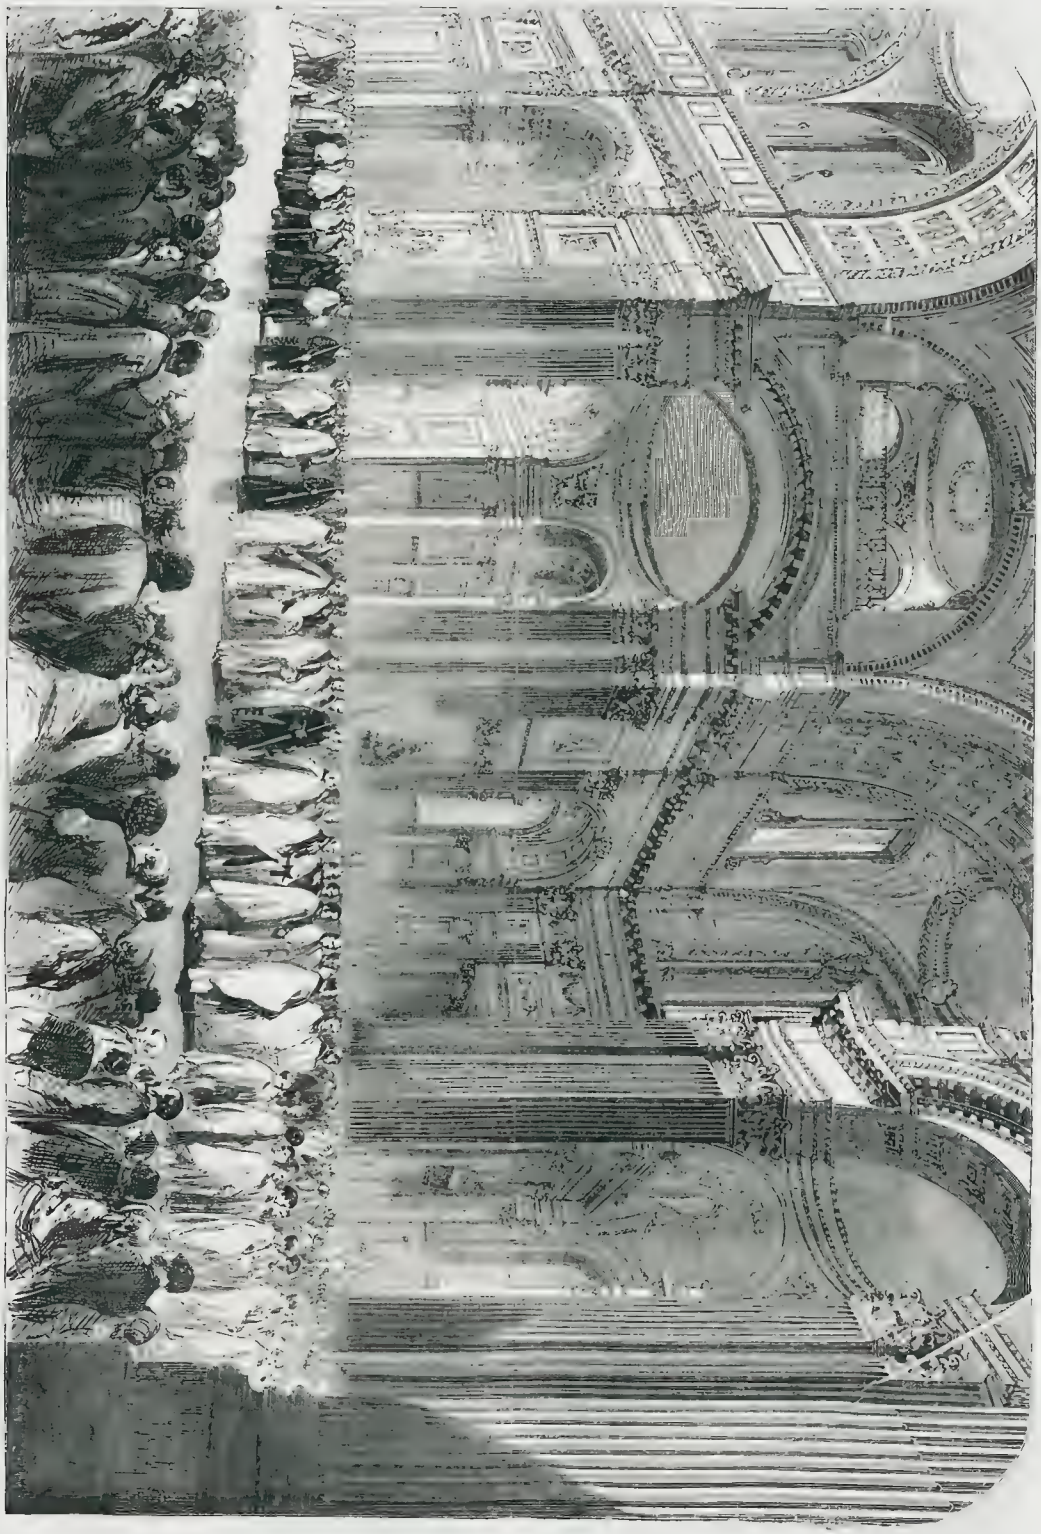
Rents will be paid for the rooms appropriated to the Literary Institution and Museum; and the latter apartment, which is being fitted up at the expense of Mr. J. H. Gurney, M.P., is to be occupied by specimens of raptorial birds—to the collection of which from all parts of the world Mr. Gurney has devoted much attention. Some very rare species have been obtained, and it is understood that as much as £100 has been paid by Mr. Gurney for a specimen. For the library about 9000 volumes have been collected and arranged on the shelves; and the Town Council have ordered the "city library," which consists almost exclusively of old theological works and treatises on the controversies which so greatly agitated the world in the sixteenth century, shall be removed from the care of the Norwich Public Library and deposited in the new building. A considerable sum was subscribed for the supply of books to the library; the list of contributors including the Duke of Wellington (£50), Sir S. M. Peto (£50), Mr. J. H. Gurney, M.P. (£50), Lord Wodehouse (£25), Lord Suffield (£25), Sir S. Bignold, Lord Stafford, Professor Sedgwick, Professor Taylor, and other gentlemen. Subscriptions have also been collected for the supply of newspapers and periodicals, and the daily journals of London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Dublin, and Edinburgh, with the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, and a number of weekly papers, are regularly laid on the tables and devoured by a great crowd of readers. Donations of books have been received from his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Hon. the East India Company, Mr. J. H Gurney, M.P., the proprietors of the Norfolk Chronicle, the committee of the late People's College in Norwich, and a number of other parties.

The building was designed by Mr. E. E. Benest, town surveyor, and the contractor was Mr. Worman, of Norwich. The amount of the original tender was £3998, and the expense of the extra story for the School of Art was about £890. The cost of the site, extras, and fittings, has altogether brought the expenditure to about £6000. To provide for this outlay Sir S. Bignold advanced on loan to the Town Council upwards of £4000.

In closing this notice we may be permitted to express a hope that Norwich may witness the realisation of the eloquent words of Sir Fitzroy Kelly on the occasion of the commencement of the building:—"In this great and populous city you only require an institution like this to place you on a level with the greatest and richest cities in the empire. Liverpool, Manchester, and Bristol have already institutions of this nature. You have here wealth, industry, population, character, commerce, manufactories; you require only the diffusion of general education to make you equal to the greatest, the proudest, the most prosperous, and the most powerful of your fellow-citizens in the British Empire."



THE PROCESSION OF THE CONVOCATION OF THE CLERGY IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—SEE NEXT PAGE

OPENING OF CONVOCATION.

THE impressive ceremony of opening a new Convocation was performed on Friday, the 1st inst., by the Bishops and clergy forming the two Houses of Convocation for the provinces of Canterbury, at St. Paul's Cathedral, where they met the Archbishop.

The right rev. the Bishops and the clergy of the province who had been cited to attend assembled in the cathedral a little before eleven. The Bishops, attired in their Convocation robes, entered by the north gate, and the clergy, in their gowns and hoods, were admitted at the south entrance. The Bishops present were London, St. Asaph, Winchester, Lincoln, and St. David's.

The Most Rev. the Archbishop of Canterbury attended by his chaplain, Dr. Thomas, and Mr. Felix Knyvett, his secretary, arrived at his Chapter-house at eleven o'clock; when he was met by the Dean of the Arches (Sir J. Dodson), the Vicar General of the Province (Dr. Travers Twiss), accompanied by the advocates and proctors of the Court of Arches. His Grace, being duly robed, attended by his chaplain and the civilians, to the west end of St. Paul's, where he was received by the Dean and Chapter.

On entering the cathedral the Archbishop was met by the Bishops and clergy of the province, who had assembled there, and who, forming a procession, conducted his Grace up the centre aisle to the Deacons' stall in the choir. The following was the order of procession 13 Choristers, 6 Vicars Choral, 6 Minor Canons Vergers, 6 Prebends, Vergers, 4 Canons; the Archbishop's Poster, with mace; the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop's Secretary and Chaplain, the Bishops of London and Winchester; the Bishops of St. David's, St. Asaph, and Lincoln; the beadle of the Arches, with his mace; the Dean of the Arches, the Vicar-General and Chancellor of London; the Advocates in their robes, the Proctors in their full-dressed gowns and hoods, the Clergy.

The procession having reached the choir, the Archbishop went into the Dean's seat, and the Bishops following his Grace took their seats on either side in the stalls of the Canons, the Bishop of London occupying his throne, while the clergy filled the body of the church.

The Litany was intoned in Latin by the Bishop of Lincoln, and the Latin sermon was preached by the Rev. Hayward Cox, Prebendary of Hereford and Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of that diocese

After the sermon the prelates and clergy went in procession to the Chapter-house, where the writ summoning Convocation was read. The Archbishop then directed the Lower House to choose a Prolocutor, and meet him in the Jerusalem Chamber, Westminster, on the following Friday. The Lower House selected Dr. Elliot, the Dean of Bristol, as Prolocutor. The Dean of Ely, who lately filled that office, has retired in consequence of ill health.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c

AUTHORS are regretting the too early death, at the age of forty-six, of Mr. Coulton, the editor of the Press newspaper. Though little known beyond the immediate circle of English writers, and engrossed almost unceasingly in newspaper literature, those who knew him best expected a time when he would have found leisure to have extended his reputation by some work for which his previous studies had peculiarly qualified him. His best contribution to periodical literature is his article in the Quarterly Review on "Junius." Mr. Coulton contended with great research and shrewdness that the bad Lord Lyttelton was Junius. He acquired and retained more readers than believers.

Her Majesty visits Manchester late in June, or early in July, and takes up her abode at Worsley, the seat of the Earl of Ellesmere, some six miles from Manchester.

The Manchester men are fond of quotations, and have evinced their skill in selection on the walls of the Art-Treasures Exhibition. Here is the last selection made by one of the most poetical of calico printers. The lines refer to the names of the artists inscribed, with all Mr. Crace's customary skill, in the several quarters, and immediately above the two ranges of historical portraits:

> Inscriptions here of various names I viewed,
> The greater part by hostile time subdued,
> Yet wide was spread their fame in ages past,
> And poets once had promised they should last.

These four appropriate verses are from Pope's "Temple of Fame." We may add that the highest poetry ever addressed to a painter was addressed by Pope to Jervas, perhaps the worst artist whose name is to be found in Mr. Crace's ornamental letterings.

Mr. Blanchard Jerrold, "of worthy father worthy son," has made a capital suggestion in a letter addressed to the Manchester Examiner and Times. He writes:

> I am certain that Manchester will take up this challenge of her hospitality, and that she will do grateful homage to the noble art of which she has proved herself a true admirer, by sending forth these words, "Manchester invites the living artists of Europe to the Art-Treasures Exhibition." It would be a noble sight to see Horace Vernet, and Ary Scheffer, and Cornelius, and Madrazo and Rosa Bonheur, and poor Decamps, and Jeanron, and Meissonnier, and the Stevens, and Knaus, and Joon, and Gerome, and Young Gustave Doré, and Rousseau, gathered about one table in your Free-trade Hall, with the Royal eminent Academicians of England and Scotland, very many British artists who are not Academicians. Will the coming summer shine upon such a gathering? In the name of art, and for the honour of Manchester, I hope so. At any rate, I put the idea which struck me in Penge Park the other day at the service of your cotton lords

The termination of Mr. Jerrold's letter reminds us that the Free Library at Manchester (in its way a noble institution, ably managed) goes by the popular name of the Cottonian Library.

Lord John Russell has spent two long days this week in the Art Treasures Exhibition at Manchester. Through the three saloons of ancient masters his Lordship was accompanied by Mr. Scharf, and through the three Saloons of the English Schools and over the Portrait Gallery by Mr. Cunningham His Lordship is understood to have expressed the warmest interest in the Portrait Gallery of the Exhibition, and not less so in the great scheme of the permanent Portrait Gallery which owes its origin to Lord Stanhope. By the way, the Stanhope purchases will find their first shelter in one of the empty rooms in the Palace at Hampton Court.

There is a picture in one of the saloons of the Manchester Art-Treasures Exhibition which passes for a Turner; is hung as a Turner; and bears the name of "Turner" in large and confident letters on its frame. It is No. 47 of saloon E; is called "River Scene Fishermen;" and the proprietor of it is Mr. Mallalieu, of Egerton. Now, it is not a Turner; but a capital specimen of Stark, of Norwich; bears the Exhibition mark of "J. Stark, No. 4," on its back; and was this week identified as a View on the River Yar, in Norfolk, and a Stark, by one who knew not the story of the inscription on the back, and one who cannot be mistaken. Was this picture sold to Sir Philip as a Turner? and, if so, by whom?

People are asking what is the best time to visit Manchester. We reply—at once and now; for though there is a little disorder in the numbering of the pictures—which time alone can remedy—there is so much to see, and the weather is so fine, that now is the moment. It was no light labour to produce a catalogue with tolerable accuracy of so large a collection. And when it is known that many of the pictures, ay, and statues (in marble), were not actually in the building (but at the last moment for sending the catalogue to press, visitors will, as indeed they do, readily pardon a few inaccuracies in the numberings. Works of art are still arriving, and settling down in the places set apart for them. The greatest difficulty, it is said, is with the English school. Let us not forget that the catalogue of the Royal Academy Exhibition, brief and unceremonious as it is, is an auctioneer's catalogue at the best, of some fourteen hundred works of art, all of which are in the building a month before the opening of the Exhibition.

This mention of the Royal Academy reminds us pleasantly enough that the forty have passed a resolution enforcing a collection of the portraits of all the living members of the Academy. Mr. Knight, the Secretary, presents a portrait of Sir Charles Eastlake, the President; and Mr. Lee, the landscape-painter, is sitting to Mr. Hart. The collection will have an immediate interest, and it is sure of a permanent importance.

COUNTRY NEWS.

HOLYHEAD HARBOUR WORKS.—GRAND BLASTING OPERATION.—It has been determined that another of those gigantic operations which have proved the practical skill and energy of the present able management of the Messrs. J. and C. Rigby, of Westminster, the contractors for the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, should take place on Thursday next; the object being that it is intended to remove by the aid of 18,000 lb. of gunpowder, a section of the Holyhead mountain, 250 feet in length, 120 feet in height, with an average grip of 20 feet, for the purposes of deposit in the Great Northern Breakwater, which it is under contemplation, after the expiration of the present contract, of further extending, so as to inclose a larger area of the bay, owing to its increasing utility as a harbour of refuge. On this occasion another opportunity will be opened to the scientific inquirer for witnessing an operation on the most extensive scale; and such an arrangement of quantities and calculations to a nicety has been arrived at by the above-named firm as to be perfectly astonishing to those uninitiated in the practice of engineering, or unacquainted with the application of powder, when brought to bear as in this instance. The above-stated quantity is calculated to upheave this vast body of quartz rock, so as to reduce it into convenient-sized masses of five to twenty tons measurement, and within a distance of 300 feet from the point of the rock. For the safety and information of our scientific and general readers who take an interest in mining or engineering operations, and who may probably wish to avail themselves of witnessing the effect of the 600 pounds of gunpowder applied as a moving agent on large masses of quartz rock, we hereby annex a plan and elevation of this Sebastopolian undertaking. The operation and engineering arrangements will be conducted personally by Mr. Charles Rigby, assisted by Mr. G. C. Berthelier. We shall engrave the scene of operation.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL IN MANCHESTER.—On Monday evening Lord John Russell arrived in Manchester, for the purpose of visiting the Art-Treasures Exhibition. During his visit, which extended to Thursday, his Lordship was the guest of Mr. John Pender, at Crumpsall House On Monday the executive committee of the Exhibition, with Sir Benjamin Hey wood and other gentlemen, were invited to meet his Lordship at dinner. On Tuesday his Lordship spent about six hours at the Exhibition Palace, and was afterwards present at a dinner-party and an evening party given by Mr Pender; and on Wednesday, after again visiting the Exhibition, his Lordship dined with James Watts, Esq., the Mayor, at Abney Hall, Cheadle; a large party of gentlemen being invited to meet him

FORGED BANK OF ENGLAND NOTES.—On Saturday information was received at the various metropolitan police-stations of the successful passing of several forged £10 Bank of England notes by a man of about 40 years of age, 5 feet 10 inches in height, and apparently afflicted with asthma. His plan of operation appears to be to visit the different watering-places for the assumed purpose of benefiting his health, and offering as an excuse for being without luggage that it has been carried by rail to a wrong place. Two notes thus passed have been duly received, and then pasted together. The water-marks in the notes at first sight appear to be good, but on the paper being held up to the light the marks are not perceptible.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

GENERALLY speaking National Stocks have been very firm in price this week; but the amount of business passing in them has not been extensive either for Money or Time. Although some large parcels of gold have been disposed of to the Bank of England, and there has been very little inquiry for that metal on Continental account, the rates of discount have ruled high, scarcely any bills having been taken in Lombard-street under the Bank minimum; and the demand for accommodation has been rather active. Evidently, however, we have passed the highest period for money, as there are various influences at work calculated to remove a portion of the present high rates. For instance, the Australian advices—to the effect that the markets are greatly overstocked—are calculated to check shipments of manufactured goods from this side, and the Continental as well as the American exchanges are more favourable. Again, the balances due to India and China are becoming smaller, and we are now importing quite as much silver from Mexico as the Eastern demand can take off. It is not improbable, that we shall have an increasing supply of gold in the Bank of England, and that the Directors will be shortly in a position to reduce the value of money

The total imports of bullion, this week, have been about £350,000, and the shipments have been considerably under £200,000 Of the late arrivals of gold from Australia and other quarters, fully £160,000 has been sold to the Bank; and we have had scarcely any inquiry for export.

There was a steady market for Home Stocks on Monday, and prices were well supported:- Bank Stock was done at 212 to 213, India Stock, 221. The Three per Cents Reduced were 93½ ¾ to 93½; New Three per Cents, 93¾ 94 93¾ ⅞; Ditto for Account, 94⅛ ¾ ⅞; New Three per Cents, 1853, 94⅛ ¼; Ditto Annuities, 1860, 94⅛; Ditto 1885, 18; India Stock, 220; Exchequer Bills, 2s. dis. to 3s. prem.; Ditto, Bonds, 80⅞ ⅝. The transactions, on Wednesday, were limited in the extreme, and prices were very firm:—Bank Stock marked 213 to 214; India Stock, 220. The Three per Cents Reduced were 93⅝ ¾ ⅞; Consols, for Money, 93⅞ 94⅛; Ditto, for Account, 94⅛ ¼; New Three per Cents, 93⅝ ¾; Long Annuities, 1860, 3 7-16; Exchequer Bonds, 98¾ ⅝. On Thursday Consols were steady, and prices were well supported:—The Three per Cents, for Money, were 94 to 94¼; for the Account, 94¼ ⅜ ½. The New Three per Cents were 93⅝ ¾ the Reduced, 93½ ⅝; March Exchequer Bills were 1s. to 4s prem; the June ditto, par to 2s. prem.; the Bonds, 98¾ ⅞; and India Bonds, 78. prem. The letter is the highest quotation marked for some time past

It has been officially announced that the privileges of the Bank of France will be prolonged for thirty years, that the present capital is to be doubled, and that the Bank is to pay into the Treasury in 1859 the sum of 100,000,000 francs, which is to be applied to the Sinking Fund. The Bank is to be the receiver of all public moneys, and so forth. Even this outline of the New Charter has not been positively agreed to; but we believe that no serious division exists in the Cabinet as to the basis of the scheme.

The transactions in the Foreign-house have not been to say extensive nevertheless, prices generally have been well supported:-Russian Five per Cents have marked 100¾: Mexican Three per Cents, 22¾ 23. All Joint-Stock Bank Shares have ruled as follows: Australasia, 88; Bank of Egypt, 16⅝. British North American, 70½; Colonial, 26⅜; London and Westminster, 47⅜; London and Provincial of England, 7¼; Oriental, 41; Ottoman, 14⅜; Union of London, 25⅞; Western Bank of London, 41.

In most Miscellaneous Securities a full average business has been passing, and prices generally have continued firm:—East and West India Docks, 120; London, 101; Australian Agricultural, 20; Crystal Palace, Preference, 5⅜; Electric Telegraph, 93¾; General Steam Navigation, 2⅝; Oriental Steam, 1⅜; Peninsular and Oriental Steam, 99; Royal Mail Steam, 59⅝ ex all; Scottish Australian Investment, 1½; Berlin Waterworks, 4⅜; East London Four per Cent Preference, 25½; Grand Junction, New, 22½; Kent 80; Lambeth, 85; West Middlesex, 97; Ditto, New, 24 prem.

THE ART-TREASURES of the UNITED KINGDOM MAGNIFICENT WORK. 120 Plates, beautifully executed in CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY, and printed by express permission by H.R.H. Prince Albert, &c., &c. The Executive Committee of the Art-Treasures Exhibition having, by the unlimited letter received their opinion of the value that would attach to such a work, Messrs. DAY and SON, Lithographers to the Queen, beg to announce that, under the direction of Mr. J. B. Waring, Architect, they are preparing for publication an important work on the contents of the Exhibition, in which it is intended to limit a list of ten to one hundred and twenty Plates, and then to destroy the stone, and to ensure a permanent and increasing value for every copy issued. The series will embrace and illustrate the magnificent sculpture, the ceramic specimens, the mediæval and other decorative arts, and each of the original issue of the work will be accompanied by historical and descriptive essays by writers of known authority. The entire Work will be produced under the direction of Mr. J. B. Waring, and executed in chromo-lithography by Mr. F. Bedford. The following letter contains the permission of the Committee, and testifies its approval of the publication:—Exhibition Building, Manchester, May 1, 1857.—Sir,—The Executive Committee for conducting the Exhibition of Art-Treasures of the United Kingdom have given the subject of your letter of the 30th ult. their very attentive consideration. The Committee desire me to say that they quite approve of the appearance of the Work intended to be published by you, embracing as it does the illustration of sculpture, the ceramic art, mediæval ornament, and other decorative arts in all the varieties now modelled and executed. The Committee has no doubt that the work will be sent forth in such a manner as to add to your already extensive reputation, as well as to repay you for the heavy risk and responsibility of publishing in London. It will be distinctly understood that the work published by you must be obtained by you from the contributors to the Exhibition, and placed in the hands of the Committee, before photographic copies can be taken of the works entrusted to the care. It is, however, not intended that the Committee should have any opinion there as to the proposed work would be a most desirable and useful memorial of the General Museum of Art, to be opened to the public on the 5th of May. I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, THOS. HAMILTON, Secretary. To Mr. W. Day, Messrs. Day and Son, Gold and Aluminographers to the Queen.

The work will consist of 100 Chromo-lithograph Plates, and a large number of Wood Engravings will be interspersed, with the descriptive letterpress. The size will be folio, 15½ by 11½. The issue will take place in parts, fortnightly; each part will contain three and occasionally four plates, with the descriptive letterpress at intervals. The price of the parts will be 5s. each; and the 1st part will appear in June next. It will be sent out July 1st. As the edition is to be limited in number, and the stones are then to be destroyed, the value of each copy will be thus enhanced. Subscribers' names should be sent immediately to the publishers; and the trade who may wish remunerated to circulate the work are requested to communicate.

CONSECRATION OF A NEW CROSS AT BLOIS.

CONSECRATION OF A CROSS AT BLOIS.

The extensive devastations by the overflow of the river Loire, in France, in the summer of 1856, will most probably be remembered by the reader though the Illustrations of the catastrophe which appeared in this Journal. Among the destructive effects of the flood was the sweeping away of a Cross which had stood for ages at Blois, in the suburb of Vienne. One of the earliest objects after the floods had cleared off was the rebuilding of the holy memorial, which was piously effected by the Bishop of Blois; and, this being accomplished, its consecration or blessing was their next duty, the day chosen for which was Maundy Thursday, the 9th ult.

The ceremony commenced by a procession consisting of hospital children and sœurs de charité, each bearing a branch of box-tree; then came the preacher at the cathedral during Carême; following whom was seen a priest with crucifix, covered with purple silk, because of the Holy Week; and after him priests, canons, and the Bishop, wearing a rich golden mitre and vesture, and bearing his crosier. The Bishop, upon his arrival at the Cross, took his seat on a raised platform to the north side. The preacher proceeded to the opposite one, and, after a hymn, addressed the people, alluding to the destruction of the former Cross by flood, and of their misery on that occasion, for not a hundred yards from where he stood many acres of land lay covered with sand to the depth of four feet. He bade them remember that these were occasioned by sin, profanation of the Sabbath, neglect of church ordinances, &c., and exhorted them to amend, that future curses might be averted. The Bishop then descended to the front of the temporary altar, repeated some prayers suitable for the occasion; then, approaching the Cross, sprinkled it with holy water, and kissed it; and, after some few words from the preacher, the proceedings terminated. The Sketch (for which we have to thank a Subscriber at Blois) represents the preacher's first address.

REINFORCEMENT FOR THE WAR IN CHINA.

We have to thank Captain Inglefield, R.A., for the original of the accompanying Illustration, a photograph, taken by him of the garrison of Malta, when upwards of 7000 troops were reviewed by Sir John Pennefather, K.C.B., in the presence of Major-General Ashburnham, and Major-General Garrett, and staff, en route to China. The lady in the foreground, next to Sir John Pennefather, is the wife of Colonel Adams, C.B., of the gallant 28th Regiment. The parade of so large a body of fine troops beneath the walls of the noble fortress is a scene of no ordinary interest.

TALK ABOUT BOOKS.

VENATOR (the hunting season having closed) is in his Library. To him enter AUCEPS and PISCATOR.

V. Ah, gentlemen, welcome! An armchair apiece; and for him who does not think the Nicotian weed injurious, or smoking by daylight an excess, there is a cigar.

A. What a hellua librorum! Look at that table strewed, crowded with new books. Have you drawn any of those covers, Venator?

V. Avoid punning, my son. I have read much of what you behold here, if that is what you mean.

P. The new number of the Quarterly. Tell us what is in it.

V.—A good average number. Eight articles. Let us see. "Pedestrianism in Switzerland," a paper by a man who knows the ground, and is somewhat sarcastic upon two classes of travellers—the easily-astounded, and the over-venturesome. A review of Mrs. Stowe's "Dred," of course, raises the Slavery question, which the reviewer predicts will one day sever the Union. An article on Lunatic Asylums is interesting; it is evidently by an official who has access to all information that can be obtained. A paper on English Political Satire gives us reminiscences of squibbing for the last three hundred years, and closes with a gracious acknowledgment that your friend Punch, Piscator——

P. Your friend Punch, Venator——

V. Everybody's friend, then, is —"what the world never had before, a specially comic journal of so much merit, combining the talents of Gilray and Hook, and always distinguished by decorum." Special recognition of Thackeray and Jerrold, as Punch-men, and a capital and capitally-deserved tribute to John Leech theonly man, bythe way, who ever sets a fellow on horseback properly. Other artists may draw men, and may draw horses, but nobody shows a horseman, and his real seat, like Leech. Well, let's see again. Photography a capital article, giving the whole history of the invention, and proving that it will in no way interfere with or supersede art, but from its very nature is capable only of relieving artists from drudgery which they should not have to undergo. Then George Borrow's queer but powerful "Lavengro," and the sequel, the "Romany Rye" —

P. What does that mean?

V. The "Gipsy Gentleman"——are noticed favourably, but not exactly in the way to delight the exigeant and infallible author. A paper on Persia, which I suppose to be by Mr. Layard, is full of information, but, you know Persicos odi they are cruel, crafty, and treacherous, and I think the last lesson they have had more valuable than the Treaty. Then comes the final article, the political one, in which Lord Palmerston's victory is admitted, but the reviewer quits commiserates the Premier for the difficulties with which he will have to contend in the new Parliament, and predicts his chief danger in finance. He is encouraged to ask for time to mature a Reform Bill, and promised the support of the Conservatives against any such measure of a democratic kind which may be produced by Lord John or any one else.

A. Tire "Testimony of the Rocks." Hugh Miller. Have you looked at that?

V. Yes, and I recommend it to you. A strong book, and a strange one. A Calvinistic geologist philosopher, with a power of pictorial expression unsurpassed, so far as I know, except by Ruskin

P. I have read the book. He is fearless in advancing all the newest discoveries in science, while asserting the eternal justice and truth of the Creator, in opposition to any finite views of what some call by those names. He regards the six Mosaical days of creation as long periods, and not as ordinary days, and considers that the Deluge covered only a portion of the globe and its inferior animals, though all the human race were within its range. He supposes Moses to have had the work of creation set before him in a series of scenes, which he subsequently described, in Genesis, from recollection. The book, of course, creates a great sensation, and the melancholy and premature death of the writer adds to its interest.

V. Here is a still more melancholy book, the "Life of Charlotte Brontë." It is a singular psychological story. The book is far from being an agreeable one, and much that is in it might have been omitted with great advantage. The real history of Miss Brontë is in her books. To study the working of the genius that enabled a sickly secluded girl to conceive and execute such work as the portraitures in "Jane Eyre" and "Shirley" is a far more satisfactory and rewarding task than to trace painful family history. You know that I have a theory against the present system of dragging into print every incident in the life of anybody who has done anything. From the coral to the coffin nothing escapes our photographers—but, as the Quarterly shows, they are not artists.

A. Miss Martineau, her friend, wrote severely about "Villette," I think.

V. Yes, it was a sort of "breaking the bruised reed," and poor Charlotte felt the infliction; though, smartly as Miss Martineau writes, one would think there was not much for a strong mind to fear in the logic of a lady who has denied a Providence and mesmerised a cow.

P. I see you've got Mrs. Marsh's new book, the "Rose of Ashurst."

V. Yes, and my womankind tell me that it is an exceedingly pleasant book, having less story than usual with the lady, but full of charming painting of rural life and home affections. I opened at one of the most delightful bits of description of a country school-house that I ever saw.

A. Another volume of Charles Knight's "History of England."

V. The history of the people, of the households, of the farms, of the shops, of the streets of old time. For once the tax-payers are biographised as well as the tax-spenders. Mr. Knight opens up the domestic life of our ancestors, and shows us that England was always a place worth living in—and why. I would remark, too, that Knight is singularly English in his feeling; he writes with fearless hardihood of kings, priests, soldiers, peasants, and all; but through all runs the sturdy conviction that there is but one England——

P. And Shakspeare is her prophet?

V. Exactly. Apropos of which, have you noticed a very interesting paper which Mr. Hepworth Dixon has just disinterred in the State-paper Office and printed? It is Shakspearean only in the locality of the scenes it describes, and in some names; but as affording evidence of the state of the popular mind touching the "new religion" it is singularly suggestive. It comprises an account of proceedings taken in reference to a disturbance occasioned by the preaching of an enlightened priest, who gave much scandal to the lower and to some of the higher members of his Stratford flock.

A. I have not had time to look at the Edinburgh. Is the number good?

P. Like its rival—an average number. The opening article is a defence of Alexander the Great, whose merits are forcibly set forth, in opposition to Niebuhr. The French census affords matter for a readable paper, in the course of which the writer tells us that the French are, doubtless, as gallant as ever, but that they are utterly disinclined to any aggressive war. The British Museum has secured a library formerly belonging to a Syrian convent in the valley of the Natron Lakes, and among its treasures are about forty-five Paschal letters of St. Athanasius, touching which another article gives all the information you can want.

V. I shall ask after them when I go to see the new room.

P. A noble room, Sir! a noble room; and one the idea of which ought to make Mr. Panizzi's name a word of honour in all households where books are honoured. A noble room, Sir! Well, there are four other articles, one about that crawling creature who gave us the great book——

V. aut Boswellina, aut——

P. Never mind the other, as it is Boxy. Then an article about Sir John Malcolm; a Chinese article, in which the rightfulness and the expediency of our dealing with China are both asserted; and it is declared that, until our just demands are complied with, we must have recourse to reprisal and coercion. Lastly, the political article is a strong one, all in favour of Lord Palmerston—a homage worth noting, as offered by the great Whig review.

A. "The Nightside of Nature"—no, "of London:" how I hate this practice of stealing or half-stealing other people's notions! It sets one at once against the book. What is it?—a sort of Life after Dark.

V. Not ill-done, in parts, though there are many blunders; and descriptions of this kind, like flower-painting, invite close inspection. The writer, Mr. Ritchie, describes night public-houses, concert-halls, dancing-places, the police-court, and other localities not exactly opened up for the first time; but it is not done in a "fast" spirit, or affectedly, and the moral tone throughout is healthy enough; only I don't see the use of the book. By the way, he is all wrong about the police reporters, and has taken up the scoff of other days—no uncommon thing with writers who are perpetually in the "accusative case."

P. What's that blue another instalment of Walpole?

V. Peter Cunningham's second volume, containing the letters from 1746 to 1756, with the trials and executions of the rebel Lords, and all sorts of good and smart things; as also things that are good without being smart, and the reverse state of affairs; but all delightful reading; and what a comfort it is to have a book printed in a type that makes reading a mechanical pleasure! At one time I began to fear that cheap editions and compression would spoil all our creak typography; but people have discovered that they have eyes to keep as well as to use, and here is a proof of it.

A. How far is a subordinate official justified in writing in the public papers upon topics connected with the department in which he is employed?

V. I see—you have been reading "The Press and the Public Service." The writer has a special case always incommoding him when he discusses the general question. He puts his points cleverly; but the instinctive feeling of society is against his view of the matter. Don't it at the end of "Bubbles of the Day" that the nobleman, finding that his butler, under a classical signature, has been habitually and patriotically cutting him up in the papers, pronounces judgment in the case of "The Press and the Public Service,"—"Kick out 'Brutus the Elder'"?

P. I have been endeavouring to read Sir Robert Peel's Memoirs; but it is hard work.

V. I have succeeded, and shall the book with a feeling of regret. There was a singular mixture of courage and cowardice about the man—a great man, too. He reversed Macbeth's condition—what he did boldly he did not do highly. And, I think, had his executors been permitted to exercise a will in the matter, they would have done well to withhold those apologetic volumes, and to leave the character of their testator to other men who, worthily estimating Sir Robert's services, would have rewarded them by transmitting him to posterity in somewhat nobler outline and attitude than he will permit himself to assume. His sensitiveness degenerates into mauvaise honte, which is scarcely pardonable when he is speaking as a statesman who had sought to serve his country, and is showing how he sought to do it. And of whom is he afraid? The people were with him—I do not mean the populace, but the nation—and he struggles to show that he was not unworthy of the confidence of a set of mediocrities and political intriguers. I repeat that I am sorry, for Peel's sake, that the book has been published. It confirms the belief that he must be a very clever man indeed who, being his own lawyer, has not an unwise client. The work will, however, be consulted rather than read, while the landmarks in Sir Robert's life will be gratefully recollected by thousands who do not care one farthing what the squirearchy thought of the man who freed the corn and the Catholics.

THE MAYS OF OLD.

SELF-LOST in wonder of the May,
We stood where snowy woods and waters meet,
The bounding wave broke and the dashing spray
Had reined our eager feet;
Eve's dying breeze swept dale and hill,
And, with the breeze, our souls grew still.

In thought we leaped yon gulf of time
Between us and our childhood rolled;
Once more the hawthorn boughs we climb
In those lost Mays of old.
Each leaf had then some truth to teach,
And life no flower beyond our reach.

O dawn that had so swift a flight!
O dreamless night! O blessèd day!
No winter then—no loss of light;
The bluebells bloomed like May.
Fresh currents heath the ice did glide,
And Spring was in the Boreal tide.

Behold a change! Those years are fled;
May-blossoms by an altar stand;
Our feet o'er scattered garlands tread—
I lead thee by the hand:
Around, white-winged, the angels play;
God is our guide, and heaven our way.

Life passes—not as seasons pass:
The leaves fell from us, not the flowers.
The days of earth died down like grass,
There dropped no blight on ours
Back back to God, like martyrs, flew
The years that died to prove us true.

Together marked we sets of sun,
Together watched the stars upwaking;
Each, among mortals, saw but one:
O vow, that knew no breaking!
While yet our souls hold fast their May,
Earth is no older—not a day.

Our path a new-spun web hath crossed,
New life a newer impulse craves
Old thoughts are dead, old feelings lost,—
We walk among their graves.
O we are old! No beauty lives
Save that the immortal spirit gives.

The same rath leaves are o'er us bending;
Once more, the hawthorn on the bough
Through all her blooms a voice is sending.—
"True souls, how dare ye now?
Are all life's joys, of May-time born,
Lost in the piercings of the thorn?"

Companion of this new-born Spring—
O darling of each lost, dead May!
Is Joy struck dumb? Hath Love took wing?
Or hath our Hope grown gray?
Not so! not so! All, all are here,
Fresh as the childhood of the year!

Thou world of beauty and delight!
Than ours no younger souls shall soar
Up from the clay sod, till day turn night,
And moon wax great no more.
Come, frost of age—come, withering blast,
We do defy ye—to the last!

Time cannot touch us, dear, nor take
From our strung hearts one chord away,
Which, struck by Love's strong hand, doth make
The music of the May!
Each trill wast upon its heavenly birth,
God's echo on this lower earth

O blessèd are the young in heart!
They whom no mortal winters chill,
In heaven's night shall walk apart
Though earth with darkness fill;
And, by the light of lost Spring days,
Find God among the silent ways!

And after a few more moves White resigned.

(a) There can be no advantage in playing the Queen to Kt 3rd, as White can then play the Kt to Q 4th, and win the game.

(c) After this move White have a bad game to fight, as they maintain their position with the greatest difficulty.

(d) Had they played the Queen to Kt 3rd, as they could easily do, Black would have won the game.

(e) This was much better than taking the Bishop; for, suppose—

HUDDERSFIELD CHESS-CLUB. The annual meeting of this club was held, according to announcement, at the George Hotel, on the 30th ult. The gathering was a most successful one, and formed a fitting climax to the past season, which, as regards both strength of chess play and attendance at the regular meetings, has been the most notable in the past history of the club. The club room was opened for chess play at three, p.m., and the chess boards were in constant requisition during the afternoon. Amongst the visitors from other towns who honoured the club with their attendance were Mr. J. S. Kipping, jun., the secretary and leading player of the Manchester Chess club; Messrs. Cadman, Mann, Ellis, &c., from Leeds; Messrs. Tomlinson and Bennett, from Wakefield; and from Halifax, Messrs. Brierley, Walsh, Fleming, &c. The Huddersfield amateurs mustered strong on this occasion—including Dr. Scott, the president; Mr. D. Marsden, the vice-president, Mr. John Watkinson, the hon. orary secretary of the club; the Revs. A. Easther, M.A., and J. E. Montgomery; and Messrs. A. Bennett, G. Brook, jun., D. A. Cooper, J. Dodds, G. Holroyd, S. Changey, J. Moxon, Oxtoby, W. Oxley, W. Parratt, G. W. Rhodes, J. R. Robinson, G. H. Taylor, M. Webb, &c.

RUSSIAN GOLD AT LEIPSIC FAIR.—It has been remarked that at the present fair the Russian and Polish dealers pay for the purchases in gold pieces of five silver roubles, instead of as before, making use of draughts or commercial bills. The abundance of specie in the hands of these foreigners is attributed to the permission which has been recently granted of exporting from Russia whatever amount they want for their journey abroad. Formerly not more than 50 imperials in gold were allowed to cross the frontier at the same time. Letter from Hamburg.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE incident Mr. EGG, A.R.A., has chosen for the subject of his picture forms that episode in the career of Mr Thackeray's hero, Henry Esmond, in which the capricious Beatrix decorates him—partly for his gallantry at the Battle of Wynendael, but more especially for his having called out Lord Mohun—with the sword and sword-knot, the "point-gift of" my Lady Dowager," Beatrix, and her mother, Lady Castlewood. All three are present at the investiture. Beatrix has thrown herself with characteristic impulsiveness on her knees, the better to arrange the bow at his side. She is evidently a wilful beauty, with her sanguine temperament, flashing eye, and full lip, her accented chin and aquiline nose. The struggling emotions of the poor faithful Colonel, as he stealthily looks down at her, are admirably given, although he tries to assume so much manliness as to appear a little stiff, or with the air of being on parade. Some of this expression, however, proper to the character, and the monstrous horseman's jack-boots contribute not a little to the same effect. Mr. Thackeray tells us somewhere in the story that the only thing a very brave officer, who served in the Marlborough campaigns, could be brought to mention was, that he was nearly taken prisoner because he could not run away in these boots; and that, when ordered by Prince Eugene up into a tree to reconnoitre the enemy, he was prevented doing so by the same impediment, which we readily believe. The humorously-painted (in more senses than one) old Dowager sits in great state in the highest taste—the head-dress of King James's reign. But a still more successful study is that of the pallid, pensive face of the mother of Beatrix, looking at the young couple so lovingly yet mournfully, and whose constancy and abnegation secured Esmond's later love, as it had always compelled his devotion. Mr. Egg has placed himself at a great disadvantage in his choice of subject, in that he aims at expressing character almost alone, for the comparatively small interest of the incident represented is nearly neutralised by the scattered composition which compels us to look at each figure separately. When, therefore, you come to such a complex character as that of Beatrix some disappointment will be felt; unjustly, however, if we once admit that the theme selected is adapted for pictorial treatment, for no artist could then succeed better than Mr. Egg has done. To a mind to this at all is indeed hypercritical while we allow artists with not a fraction of Mr. Egg's subtlety of conception to boldly christen simple heads, without a flicker of expression or any explanatory accompaniment, with the most far-fetched names. Unless, indeed, great latitude were allowed, not only this work in particular, but most pictures, would explain themselves to a very small extent. Now, we do not go from the picture to the story: we come with a knowledge of the story to the picture, and never expect to read everything implied in a work of art without that knowledge. The painting is very nicely assimilated to the subject, and is, in fact, the very counterpart of the style of the author—simple and subdued, yet forcible and manly; rich, without false glitter, and softened, as it were, with the grayish melancholy memories of "long ago."

"The First Break in the Family" (284), by Mr. Faed, is fully equal to his efforts of last year; and although Mr. Faed still inclines rather more to the sentimental than the purely emotional, yet there is much truth to nature accompanying his refinement of treatment and delicacy of feeling. The "break in the family" is occasioned by the departure of "bonny young Willie," whose figure may still be seen on the top of the stage-coach in the distance, as it takes the road across the moor which the finger-post tells us leads to London. His whole family have gathered at their cottage-door to see him off, and are watching in silent grief to catch the last glimpse of their favourite. The manly grief of the father; the humbling despondency of poor old "granny," who thinks she shall never see her darling more; the anxious yearning of the mother, who kneels to implore the protection of Heaven on her child; and the little ones who, not properly comprehending the event, cling apprehensively to their mother, are all sympathetically painted. The most interesting figure, however is that of the poor love-lorn lassie, who stands retiringly behind the family. She feels she has lost more than they all—her only hope and joy in life. She turns her eyes away from what they can no longer see, and, clasping her hands, prays for the blessing which has just spread its all its beauty and promise before yonder dark cloud, and will the good omen of which that poor family is cheered, and which will surround as with a halo the recollection of their dear Willie—she sees not. Her hopes seem shattered and dispersed as the petals of the rose she unconsciously strews on the ground. In truth, the exquisite beauty of her face, though scarcely consistent with the bare feet, is yet so lovely, so sweetly sad, so delicately modelled, and the play of reflected light upon it so tenderly felt, that such a face alone is quite sufficient to make the reputation of a painter

The contributions of Mr. Horsley, A.R.A., are various and original. "Life and Still-Life" (8) represents a French modiste looking out of the picture with intense and bright-eyed vivacity, and all cheerfulness and contentment, though working as artistes at Paris. She has her bouquet of flowers by her side, fresh that morning from the Marché aux Fleurs, and is engaged constructing an elaborate cap, while her own frank face and black hair are set off by a simple white handkerchief tied with grisette coquetry. The clumsy nudity of the pasteboard doll upon which she has placed the cap so as to try its effect affords the amusing "still-life" contrast to her animated face. "Youth and Age" (180) is very suggestive. The contrast is carried even into the inanimate objects. Down a shady lane a poor old woman has tottered uncheered by the early autumn sunshine which struggled through the overhanging trees and playfully chequered her path, intent only upon collecting firewood, and has stopped to pick up a withered branch close to the gnarled roots and rugged, wrinkled trunk of a large tree. A group of girls and children have overtaken the old dame, and several other girls are seen playfully approaching at the top of the acclivity. The smallest of the foremost group offers the poor lonely old woman a flower with natural child-like confidence, while an older boy shrinks and hides behind his sister's skirts, having been frightened, perhaps, by stories of witches and their kidnapping propensities. "Hide and Seek Found" (209) is especially noteworthy for the humorous figure of the slim Elizabethan gallant, who appears anxious to shrink into the tree in his anxiety to hide behind it. His guitar would seem to intimate that he has come to serenade some fair inmate of the old red brick mansion in the distance as soon as darkness befriends him. An incautious tune up, or some inkling of suspicion, has, however, attracted his mistress forth, and her mischievous spaniel soon discovers the bashful lover to her and her laughing companion, by setting up a vigorous barking. Her overhanging locks of intimation the modest youth can put on. A certain primness still preserved in his screwed-up lips renders the expression very droll, and altogether he seems one of those weak and diluted specimens of the sterner sex whom mischievous girls delight in quizzing and teazing into mortal agony. "The Nun" (310) is full of pensive sweetness. There is one great merit in Mr. Horsley's manipulation—it never attracts, or rather distracts, the attention, and is always judiciously proportioned to the interest of what it is intended to express. He has also shown this year that, like Mr. Hook, he is as much at home in landscape as with the figure.

The last remark inverted will apply to Mr. Redgrave, R.A., seeing that in the early part of his career he painted landscapes alone. The unassuming merit of the picture, "The Well-known Footstep" (62), we need not point out. A poor woman sits under the humble porch of her cottage—and that it is her wont to do so is nicely suggested—in order to catch the first sight or sound of her soldier-husband's return, her loneliness only relieved by the prattling of her little daughter. But, hush! at last she hears the "well-known footstep," as is beautifully conveyed in her eager, listening attitude, and the emotion mantling over her face. The poor wounded soldier is seen approaching with his eyes raised anxiously to heaven. "The Moorland Child" (238) is quite a little gem; and there are besides some of Mr. Redgrave's pieces of refreshing greenery.

Mr. Frank Stone, A.R.A., has made an advance in his very charming "Bonjour, Messieurs" (365)—a cheery exclamation made by several coquettish French girls returning from market in a cart to two travellers on foot—who are not seen, however; but from their shadows in front you ascertain that one is in the act of gallantly taking off his hat or képi, which even a churlish Englishman would scarcely fail to do at sight of such a bevy of beauties. Few also, we think, would fail to keep pace with such attractive compagnons de voyage, although they would not fail with their merry espiéglerie to test one's good temper. We fear it would be hopeless to prevail upon the dogged, jealous driver, who is evidently dumfoundered at the roguish vivacity of the girls, to allow the burden of his cart to be increased, for the slow straining of the poor horse proves it to be overloaded already. The glee of the children, the Puck-like expression of the little girl behind the driver, and the ecstasy of delight of that young urchin kicking up his heels on the flyboard, contrasted with the snow of the old woman, are pleasantly imagined. The painting is very dainty and finished, yet the whole has a greater air of real life than many of Mr. Stone's former productions. Poor "Margaret at the Spinning-Wheel" (190), but with her distaff lying forgotten on the ground, has a very tender and heartbroken air, but the face of the sitting figure is somewhat sickly.

Mr F. PICKERSGILL, A.R.A., gives us in No. 84 that interesting and poetical subject "Twelfth Night," in which the innuendos and evasions of the disguised Viola would certainly discover, even though her feminine appearance did not, both her sex and her love to Duke Orsino, whom she took so preoccupied with his own love for Olivia. In the picture he is made to start in momentary undefined doubt, and she half turns from his gaze, very naturally and modestly. The attitudes and expressions of both are very successful. The colour, though rich, is more than usually quiet, and unites into a fine deep tone.

There is a very pleasing picture (No. 123) by Mr. GOODALL, A.R.A., in which a French rustic is whispering in his Jenny's ear the lines—

Veux-tu la tendresse, me voila, Jenny.
Veux-tu la richesse, prends, prends.

The concealed pleasure with which she listens to her passionate lover is very prettily rendered. Mr. Goodall has drawn from the source whence he has already derived the materials for many picturesque pictures in his other contribution "The Wedding Day, Brittany" (300).

Mr. FRITH, R.A., is engaged, we believe, upon a large picture—"Derby Day." We may expect, therefore, next year to be as much surprised and gratified as we were with his admirable "Margate Sands." In the mean time, we have two single-figure studies with which—though of course merely the painter's relaxation—we confess to be disappointed. The conception of both is commonplace: they have little of Mr. Frith's dexterous handling and refinement of method, while the colouring is heavy and inharmonious. The dark tone of the first, "Kate Nickleby at Madame Mantalini's" (150), may be understood to represent appropriately a very dark indoor effect; but we cannot find a reason for this murky colouring in "A London Flower-girl" (162), in the open air, unless, indeed, Mr. Frith wished to represent our atmosphere with unnecessary conscientiousness.

Mr. HOOK, A.R.A., has three works full of nature, and with all his cheerful sunniness and vigour. It seems as if he painted with some glistening luminous medium, that gives his works unapproachable purity and force of colour. To be sensible of this, you have only to stand in the middle of the room, to feel how those small pictures come forward from most of the comparatively flat, muddled canvases surrounding them. This is a great merit in the subjects he paints sunny fields and sparkling sea-shores—in which, do all he can, he will still fall short of Nature's own intensity. The figures also, from his previous study, are far better than landscape-painters can generally supply; and his faces are natural, innocent, and weatherbeaten. He takes us this year to his old haunt in North Devon—Clovelly, with its sea-wall—in the "Widow a Son Going to Sea" (278). The poor woman is letting, with all the tearful reluctance and sad forebodings of a mother's heart, her eldest and only son go down to that treacherous sea which has made him fatherless and her a widow. The boy hides his grief from the men who are conveying his chest over the sea-wall down into the boat; and partly from the adventurous spirit of youth, and partly to lessen his mother's anguish, he endeavours to put on a care less air; but you see plainly enough it is only assumed, and you think also what will be the loneliness of that widowed heart when he is far away. As a painting, "A Signal on the Horizon" (160) is still better. A boatman or pilot of the same class, with the same build in him, has just made out that the "union-jack" of the distant sail "is at the fore." The discovery plainly interests them all. Probably a piloting job up the Bristol Channel awaits him, for his boy stands beside with the tarpaulin coat as if ready to accompany his father "in his boat to the ship. The attitude of the man, with his bald patch, the crow's-feet in the corner of his eye as he looks through the old glass, his general rough sea-worn looks, and partly-bleached clothes, are admirably faithful. In the "Shipboy's Letter" (645) we are quite inland, and, as we learn from the fallen envelope, among the pleasant Surrey hills. The mother has just received a letter from her wicked runaway son, who persisted in the fancy most boys have at some particular age (especially if they have never felt sea-sickness) of going to sea, and has run with it to her husband who is at work in the fields. The fair-haired, honest, manly upturned face of the husband, anxiously listening to his wife as she so eagerly reads him the letter, without a shadow of the old displeasure at his son's disobedience, is as charmingly natural and thoroughly English as the delightfully refreshing landscape.

Mr. FROST, A.R.A., gives us a party of Naiads and Dryads of different complexions and temperaments displaying their bad taste (if we may be permitted, not being of the fair sex, to give an opinion upon such a subject) by mourning over the yellow blossoms which, according to Ovid, are all that remains of that supreme fop "Narcissus" (14). We think these female forms are scarcely so exquisite as those we have been in the habit of seeing from Mr. Frost's pencil; and the colouring is unusually cold and dry.

"The Field Conventicle" (391), by Mr. POOLE, A.R.A., represents, through this artist's peculiar (to say the least) yellow atmospheric medium of the last few years, a party of Scotch Noncomformists worshipping in the fields when the harsh measures of Charles II. prevented their doing so under cover. Although in the picture the pastor is in a wrapt and enthusiastic attitude, the attention of the rest does not convey, as Charles Kean, his son on one occasion, diverged in every possible direction. They would not, of course, be placed in formal rows as if seated in pews, and we understand that they may be on the look-out apprehensively; but, with every allowance, the figures are too much scattered.

Before taking our congé of the Royal Academicians who have contributed to the figure department of the Exhibition we must mention that Mr. A. E. CHALON, R.A., has two fanciful pictures; that Mr. PATTEN, A.R.A., has some large classical nudities; and that Messrs. UWINS, R.A., JONES, R.A., and A. COOPER, R.A., do not yet repose on their laurels.

THE SHAM MIRACLE OF LA SALETTE.—Another trial was concluded at Grenoble last week, about the famous miracle of La Salette. Few can have forgotten the story of the appearance of the Virgin to two shepherd boys on the mountain, whom she warned that, unless the people behaved better, they would lose their corn, and have their potatoes blighted. The Bishop swallowed the story, and the water of the stream by which the Virgin sat became a very valuable marketable commodity. Two priests, shocked at the scandal brought on their Church, instituted an inquiry, the result of which was to satisfy their minds that a somewhat cracked lady of the name of La Merlière was the burden of a great fraud; and they published proofs which satisfied all, except some English Puseyites and his Holiness the Pope. The lady brought an action against the priests for defamation of character, and was defeated; and the present trial is an appeal to a higher tribunal, ending, as we learn by telegraph, in a verdict confirming the first. The Government would not allow the trial to be reported, which is to be regretted, as advantage will be taken of the circumstance to maintain this grossest of gross impostures.

ADVENTURES OF A VETERAN.—Amongst the guests of the Grand Duke Constantine at dinner at the Russian Embassy was General ORNANO, Governor of the Invalides, and a strange adventure which befel the General in the campaign in Russia, in 1812, was related to the Prince. The General's horse was killed by a cannon ball, and he was thrown to the ground with such violence that he remained inanimate, and was supposed to be dead. He was placed on a second horse to be conveyed from the field to be interred; but, at the moment, that horse was also struck with a cannon-ball, and killed. In falling heavily to the ground the General made a movement which proved that he was still alive. He was accordingly placed in the cart of a cantinière and carried some distance, when the cart could advance no further; he was then carried in a litter to the bivouac of the Emperor Napoleon I., who, having been informed that he was dead, had given orders for his interment. His Majesty (to whom he was related), learning that he was still alive, caused him to be placed in his own landau, the sole carriage which remained, and continued the route on foot. The Grand Duke Constantine manifested great interest in this narrative.

ITALIAN COLLECTION OF M. DU BOULAY,

PALL MALL EAST.

THIS collection was made by the proprietor during a residence of several years in Florence, and is well worthy of a visit during the present gravitation of public attention towards Italian art, if it were only to see the first object in the catalogue, which is the well-known "Maddalena Penitente" of Pampaloni, which was the last of his performances, it having been purchased from the widow of the sculptor by the present proprietor. It is a beautiful work of the Christian realist, not antique, school, and represents the penitent grasping the cross, the intention of the sculptor being to express the complex sentiments of remorse and faith, of grief and love; and we feel bound to say that, in our opinion, the artist has been eminently successful, not only in the expression, but also in the pose and modelling of the other parts of the frame. There is much settled tenderness in the expression, and total freedom from anything like the tormented, which is the characteristic of too much of the Christian sculpture as contrasted with the classic. Nor is the modelling generalised; a realist air pervades all the limbs and flesh parts. We feel that the artist has attempted no impossible grace, but has stuck to models under his eye, but those select ones, and the chiselling is beautiful; for Pampaloni, bred at Carrara, was not one of those sculptors who could work only in plaster.

Pampaloni having died so recently, there has been no time to embody his biography in fine-art dictionaries. We may therefore mention, for the information of those who admire this work, that Pampaloni was born in 1791, and was educated at the Florentine Academy of the Fine Arts, and studied anatomy under Francesco Battini, the chief of his class. His first work, when a mere lad, was a small bust of Napoleon Bonaparte, which he carried on his own shoulders from Carrara to Florence. During many years he was not properly a sculptor, but a worker in alabaster for the export houses; but, at length, in 1819 he gained the first triennial prize for basso relievo given by the Fine-Art Academy of Florence, and this gave him at once a status. His "Sleeping Boy," for a Polish nobleman who had recently lost a son, was so popular that he executed twenty-five commissions for repliche. His most celebrated works were the statues of Arnolfo du Lapo and Brunellesco, now standing in the Piazza Santa Maria del Fiore, in Florence, which Thorwaldsen visited in the studio, and which called forth an expression of surprise that he had managed to execute such works in so narrow a space. Pampaloni's last work was this "Penitent Magdalen" now in London. The city of Genoa had bespoken and approved of his design for a monumental basso relievo of Columbus, their great compatriot, "on his return from America, presenting himself, with a map, at the Court of Spain;" but on the eve of the execution of this interesting work Pampaloni died, in November, 1847.

There are thirteen pictures in this collection. The chief one, No. 8, is "The Vision of St. John at Patmos," by Carlo Dolce, from the Rinuccini Gallery, and is certainly a high-class picture, with a certain grandezza, in which Carlo Dolce was often deficient. It is of life size, and the figure of John is full of an elevated wonder and religious amazement. The colouring is deep and rich, and the cold tones are managed with striking skill—not so inky and chaotic as is sometimes the case with Carlo Dolce.

A "St. Cecilia," by Guido Cagnacci, although a little affected in expression, is a vigorous and harmonious piece of colour, and in brilliant condition. We cannot say the same for the condition of No. 6, "The Angel Strengthening Christ during his Agony in the Garden," attributed to Razzi, but the head of the angel is beautiful, having all the suavity and perfect distinction of Razzi or Correggio.

The two works attributed to Lorenzo di Credi, Nos. 2 and 11, the former "The Virgin Adoring the Infant Jesus," and the latter "A Nativity," have the beautiful backgrounds and aerial perspectives of this master. Two rare names are also represented in this collection. Michael Angelo Anselmi, with whose works we were not previously acquainted, contributes a "Flight into Egypt;" and Onorio Marinari, the cousin and pupil of Carlo Dolce, has a "Holy Family" of fine expression.

THE WAR IN CHINA.

DESTRUCTION OF PIRATICAL JUNKS

We this week engrave two additional illustrations of this affair from Sketches by the Correspondent referred to on our last week's Journal. We add a more copious account from the China Mail.

On the 14th Feb., it was agreed to send the chartered steamer Eaglet and the Hon. Company's steamer Auckland to Toong-chung, where it was known that several heavily-armed mandarin junks were lying. The place is a naval station, and the junks, under command of an admiral, had been lying there for some time, their presence at that spot being well known to the Hong-Kong authorities for some time past. About two p.m. of Sunday the Auckland and Eaglet steamed straight for Toong-chung Bay. As the water was known to shoal in the bay, commencing from the western point of Chung-pock Island, and running south and westerly to a projecting point in Lantao, the Eaglet was ordered to go ahead sounding, until she got into three fathoms, when she was to hoist number three pennant. Having felt her way in to the required sounding, she ran on until she was in about eight feet of water, which brought her within the range of five heavily-armed junks, when she anchored, and at once opened fire on them. In about five minutes the junks and five batteries surrounding the bay replied. After about a quarter of an hour's firing, H. T. Ellis, Master, in command of the Eaglet got his two boats out, hoping that the Auckland's boats would also be ready to shove off in support of him. Unfortunately the Auckland had got aground, and was not prepared to send her boats, and the fire of the junks on the two boats was very hot, the water being dashed in the men's faces by the grape and round shot; to which the boats, having no guns, could make no reply, that it was deemed best to return and wait for the assistance of the boats of the Auckland. After getting on board, the Eaglet resumed her fire, as did the Auckland, the latter vessel firing over the Eaglet at the forts and junks. The latter vessel was hit several times, but no lives were lost. After about three quarters of an hour's firing the ammunition of the Eaglet gave out, and with only a few rounds in her magazine the anchor was hove up, and the boat backed out, still keeping up her fire, to the Auckland. The cause of that steamer not sending her boats was then ascertained. She was hard and fast aground. As, however, her guns could bear, no time was to be lost. the boats were got out and manned (a pinnace, two cutters, and the gig of the Auckland, and the gig and jolly-boat of the Eaglet, were taken in tow by the latter steamer, which again ran in towards the town. The boats were cast off and pulled towards the junks, which kept up a very hot fire, mortally wounding one man, and two severely. The fire was replied to by the boats until they were half-a-dozen lengths from the enemy: a cheer from them soon sent all the Chinese out of their vessels, and not a soul remained to oppose the boats taking possession. The junks were found to be aground, and their starboard guns, pointing to the land, were manned by the boats' crews, and turned on the forts, the town, and the flying enemy. After a short time, the boats were pushed for the nearest fort to the west of the town. On approaching, it was found to be deserted; the guns, thirty in number, were spiked, and the house and sheds in the inclosure set fire to. It was now so dark that it was thought imprudent to take the men against the other forts, which were situated at about a mile distant. They therefore embarked, and pulled for the junks, which were set on fire. Although this was done with as much precaution as possible, that the boats might have time to pull off before the magazines exploded, it unfortunately happened that the last fired had some ready communication with the magazine, and as Mr. Ellis and Lieut. De Belin, of the Auckland, were descending the side into their boats, after having seen the junk well on fire, the magazine exploded. The two officers were thrown over the boat some distance, and were picked up stunned and slightly bruised, the man in the boat also suffered, three of them having been more or less wounded. The boats and the Eaglet then ran out to the Auckland, and the two steamers lay together until the morning, when it was seen that the junks were burnt down to the water's edge. A boat came off early in the morning with a peace-offering of two bullocks and some pigs, and a letter from the elders, begging the men-of-war to spare their town. As the Admiral had ordered that the steamers should be back in Hong-Kong the previous evening, it was thought best that the Eaglet should return at once to take in coal and ammunition, and send some assistance to get the Auckland off.

Having taken Mr. Caldwell on board, the Eaglet started for Hong-Kong. In the Cup-suy-moon a large boat, filled with men and heavily armed, was observed at anchor. Mr. Caldwell pronounced her to be a passage-boat, which it was unnecessary to meddle with. As the Eaglet passed down the harbour with the Chinese Admiral's flag flying at the fore, she was lustily cheered by the merchant vessels.

Having reported the state of affairs to the Admiral, he resolved to send the Niger to get the Auckland off, but with instructions to leave Toong-chung alone, as no danger was to be apprehended from that place after the destruction of the fleet. The Niger got under way about one o'clock, and, steaming through the Throat Gates, met the Auckland coming in; she then saw the boat under sail which the Eaglet had passed that morning; it was hailed by the Chinese pilot to lower her sails and heave to. No reply being given, a few musket-shots were fired at it with as little effect. On this a gun was fired through the boat, which had the effect of bringing it to, when it was found that one man had been killed (cut in two by the shot) and three wounded. After the latter were examined by the surgeon of the Niger they were returned on board. The boat was found to be what we have already stated — a passenger-boat. From the Calcutta the two steamers were at once dispatched to pick up a portion of the pirate fleet, which it had been discovered were on the other side of Chung-yue, better known as Pirates' Island, the next island to Stonecutter's. The Auckland went round to the west and the Niger to the east of the island, and between them they hemmed in eight junks. The Auckland seems to have at once gone at them, and the crews of three junks took to land, where they were followed by the small-armed men, who killed and wounded several, and took a prisoner. The same dodge was tried on by the other boats with the Niger as was done with Commodore Armstrong, a Chinese coming on board dressed up in great style to say that the junks were rebels. Mr. Caldwell, who was on board, was not Commodore Armstrong, and the Chinese commander was informed he was a prisoner as a pirate.

Killed—Peter Aleman, O.S.

Severely wounded—W. Harrison, A.B.; J. Sullivan, O.S.

Slightly wounded—Lieut. D'Belin; D. Johnson, A.B.; H. Smith, A.B.; P. Sykes, O.S.

The above belong to the Auckland. In addition, Mr. H. T. Ellis, commanding Eaglet, was slightly wounded when blown from the junk.

The storehouse of Mr. Duddell, the Government contractor, has been burnt down, with the destruction of some 700 barrels of flour.

Last week we engraved the attack of the junks, and the burning of the Commodore's vessel. We now add the Eaglet's first gun; and the Eaglet, dressed in the Chinese flag, the Commodore's at the fore, with the union-jack over it, passing between the Calcutta and some merchantmen, who loudly cheered the victors.

RETURN OF THE "EAGLET" TO HONG-KONG, DRESSED IN THE CHINESE FLAG.

THE INNS OF COURT AND CHANCERY.

And now it is time to advert briefly to the modern desuetude of the provisions formerly made for educating students, and to the arrangements recently made by the Inns of Court to improve the means of legal education.

The earlier history of the Inns of Court shows that the student was assisted by Readers in different branches of the law, who were provided by the Inn; and that he had the advantage of taking part in those "moots," or exercises, which assisted him in acquiring practical dexterity in argument, and accustomed him, so to speak, to the atmosphere of law. These "Readings" were anciently of great importance and dignity. It was long the custom for young men of family and fortune to attend them for the purpose of acquiring enough knowledge of law to qualify them for managing their estates and acting as magistrates. Every barrister who was promoted to be a

CLEMENT'S INN.—(DESCRIBED AT PAGE 441.)

Bencher undertook to become Reader, in consideration of which service he had his chambers, and at Gray's Inn is recorded to have had liberal allowances of wine and venison. The Readers used to give great feasts, and spend enormous sums of money at their readings; but these entertainments seem to have been commuted for a fine or money payment after the time of the Merry Monarch; and the readings having ceased, the Bencher has continued to pay a large fine on his promotion, in lieu of reading, his right to chambers being retained. Glowing accounts are given of the Readers' entertainments in the good old times. The last occasion on which the sovereign was a guest was the entertainment given in the Inner Temple Hall by Sir Heneage Finch, Solicitor-General when Charles II. partook in the revels. At these entertainments it was the custom to serve a swan or a peacock whole, as the luxurious Romans did at the table of Hortensius; but now, although the Bench table may be occasionally furnished with the ambrosial champagne and the melting turtle, we look in vain for the profuse banquets and the inspiriting music which once enlivened the forensic halls, and cannot but sigh when we think of the gay revels that were led by a Chancellor, and the entertainments that were given to a Prince. But to return to educational provisions.

It is only very recently that the readings have been revived to some extent by the lectures which the Inns of Court have instituted. The moots have long fallen into desuetude; the exercises have dwindled to the merest shadow of what they were; and even now an examination is compulsory only on those students who have not attended the lectures. As to the exercises the empty form of our student days is thus described by Mr. Whateley in his evidence:—

When I was a student I used to be marched up to the barristers' table with a paper in my hand, and I said, "I hold the widow ——" the barrister made a bow, and I went away; and the next man said, "I hold the widow shall not ——" and the barrister made a bow and he went off.

Of course under the system that lately prevailed, a man (as one of the witnesses remarks) might, as well pass through a hollow tree as through an Inn of Court, as far as regarded the acquisition of legal knowledge and fitness; and the ordeal of Hall and Bar-table did not even prevent unworthy persons from proceeding to the degree of barrister-at-law. At Gray's Inn the Benchers are stated to have called some years since a man who was a country police inspector, and another aspirant who was found keeping a shop under a false name.

All that is at present required of a person who wishes to become a student of the law in England, with the view of being ultimately called to the Bar, is, that he become a member of one of the four Inns of Court; that he keep twelve terms by dining a certain number of times in hall, and that he attend during one year the Lectures of two of the Readers appointed by the Council of Legal Education, or, at his option, submit to a public examination, which is compulsory only upon those students who do not attend the lectures. These requirements present a striking contrast to the system of legal education pursued in the principal States of Europe, and even in Scotland and the United States of America; and they fall short of what may properly be demanded of societies empowered to confer upon selected individuals a peculiar position and consequent privileges. It would be curious to contrast with our system the provisions of the Law Schools of France (for example), with a view to ensure the fitness of the candidate for the privileges conferred upon him, but into such a comparison we have not space to enter. Suffice it to say that the systems of legal education in other countries regard the question as affecting the character of the Bar as a learned profession, and the fitness of their graduates for the confidence of the community, no less than the student's individual capacity for success. The existence of a highly-educated, liberal minded, independent, and enlightened Bar, is a safeguard of the community, and it is most important to the public that only persons duly qualified by general as well as professional acquirements should go forth with the mint-mark of the legal degree. So thought the Greeks of the Eastern Empire in the time of Constantine, when Berytus—the Beyrout of our times—attracted students by its fame as the metropolis of ancient law; and so think the jurists of France, whose system brings candidates for degrees in law to L'Ecole de Droit in Paris, which seems to be now much what Berytus was to the aspirant for Administrative or Legislative employment. But we do not need the wisdom of either the ancient Empire of the East or the modern Empire of the West to guide us to the conclusion that efficient tests should be established with a view to raise the character of the acquirements of the candidate for the Bar.

The Commissioners have directed their attention as well to the duty which the several societies owe to the public as to the duties which they owe to the student; and they state the various experiments that were tried by the different Inns of Court down to 1851, when the present system was established under authority of the Council of Legal Education. The Benchers who form that learned body have appointed a Reader on Common Law, a Reader on Conveyancing, a Reader on Jurisprudence and Civil Law, a Reader on Equity, and a Reader on Constitutional Law and Legal History. Mr. Phillimore, Q.C., the Reader on this branch, thinks that the subjects embraced by his lectures are usually much neglected, and, by way of illustration, mentions that one of the gentlemen who was thought worthy to pass [illegible] of the Spanish Armada; and that another, who was equally great with regard to Lord Clarendon (we do not mean her Majesty's worthy Secretary for Foreign Affairs), was selected for honourable notice on account of professional attainments.

The question appears to have been much considered by the Commissioners whether there should be a compulsory examination to test the extent to which the students profit by the educational provisions made. The eminent men who fill the office of Reader are unanimous in recommending that examination; and the Commissioners have arrived at the same conclusion. They also think that persons who are not graduates should be examined before admission to the Inns of Court with a view to test that general knowledge which is so essential to the practitioner in our courts of justice. They therefore propose that the Inns of Court should form a university, with a governing body, who should be empowered to regulate examinations and confer degrees; each society preserving its independence as regards its property and internal government.

A scheme for legal studies is under consideration at Oxford, where there is already a school of Law and Modern History; and for the study of the law on the banks of Cam provisions have been recently made by the sister university. As regards the study of the Roman Civil Law—that indelible constituent of our composite legal fabric—the ancient universities had long before wisely made provision. Great lawyers have attributed their proficiency in the Common Law of England to their early study of the Roman Civil Law—texts of which (as Professor Maine well remarks) have been worked at all points into the foundation of our jurisprudence, just as Roman materials have been preserved in the fabric of our oldest buildings.

We therefore confidently look forward to the time when a due course of instruction in law will have to be followed by every candidate for the Bar, and when students will be encouraged to climb to this vantage ground of success.

WM. SIDNEY GIBSON, Member of Lincoln's-inn.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

MR. FRANCIS TALFOURD'S new burlesque, or, as he is pleased to entitle it, a classical love story, originally suggested by Ovid, under the egyle-ation of "Atalanta, or, the Three 'Golden Apples," is attracting large audiences at the Haymarket Theatre. We give an illustration of the last scene of this popular production, which is described as "The Court of Courtship; or, Home of the Heart's Soft Whispers," a brilliant and beautiful representation of the Temple of Hymen, most artistically painted by Mr. William Callcott. The burlesque itself is full of wit, whim, and puns, and appears likely to enjoy, with its own heroine Atalanta, a very long run. We under stand Mr. Buckstone to be so well satisfied with his author that Mr. Talfourd has been specially retained to produce the next Easter offering at the Haymarket.

MR. WILLIAM RUSSELL.

THE historiographer to the nation—for who deserves the title so well as the writer who stood for millions every step of the great war of our age? commenced his lectures, at Willis's Rooms, on Monday night, Thursday and Saturday being set apart for the other two of the series. Any preliminary doubt of their perfect success was almost an injury to the man and an insult to the public; but the special and affectionate enthusiasm manifested for the lecturer by the brilliant circle of literary friends whom he counted among his audience was certainly a demonstration which, though it could not surprise those friends, who know how well he deserved it, may have been unexpected by the public generally. The throng of men who have "made their mark," and who came to witness the success of William Russell, was almost unprecedented. The lecture, of unusual length, was listened to with intense attention; its graphic, comic, or satiric—were taken with electric appreciation; but the best sign was the attention we have mentioned, which was preserved, unflaggingly, for two hours and a half, and was as earnest at the close as at the commencement of the evening.

The subject of the war is a grand one, and might of its own strength carry through a lecturer of powers far inferior to those of Mr. Russell. But, on the other hand, he had already created for himself the most dangerous rivalry in the immortal letters from the Crimea, in which he gave the Story of the War.

> What eye but sparkles, and what pulse but speeds,
> As the broad page tells out our warriors' deeds, was written while the contest was raging. And the letters that sped the pulses, and bade the eye sparkle, were supplied to the broad page by the hand of the man who, for the first time, addressed an audience on Monday. Those noble letters are fresh in the recollection of all who were present, and the very name of Gallipoli recalled all the sensations with which we used to address ourselves to the welcome, yet too often saddening, correspondence from the army. Necessarily also, this lecture touched upon many of the points raised by the letters, and though the whole story has been entirely recast, and details most desirable in the correspondence have been subordinated to the grand march of events; while technicalities and questions of dispute have been completely thrown aside; still the aroma of the Crimean Letters breathed through the Crimean Lecture. But, so far from doing the latter an injury, a benefit was conferred by the recollections. We were at once, at home with the lecturer, certified of his perfect knowledge of all that he had to tell, and of worlds of other things that he could tell if he pleased; and we listened to his fresh and glowing narrative with increased pleasure from the conviction that he was handling a subject of which he has entire mastery.

We have not the least intention of attempting a summary of the lectures. They will be heard by the public at large, and it would be unfair both to the lecturer and his audience to pluck out the heart of his mysteries, when they are to be revealed by himself for the delight and instruction of thousands. The prices at which admission is at present obtained are high, and we conceive that the lowering them so high was a wise, though a bold step. The lectures will shortly be what they will undoubtedly be—personal reputation and profit. We have a great subject. It is well to let the seats within the reach of many while the final and indelible impressions of the Crimean War. This will be the case when the price is reduced. It is, therefore, most desirable that these addresses should, in the outset, pass before the tribunal of a first-class audience, not only that they may obtain whatever prestige is thereby to be gained, but that any possible crudeness may be softened, any accidentally-omitted statement may be supplied, and, in short, that the accomplished lecturer may put them through that invaluable finishing process, known upon the stage as a dress rehearsal. As such, we are inclined to consider the first series of Mr. Russell's lectures, and, therefore, we fully concur in the fixing the prices at their present high scale.

Mr. Russell commences his lecture with his voyage from Marseilles to Malta; thence takes his audience to Gallipoli; and, accompanying the Allied Armies, to Varna. He visits Aladyn, Devna, and Monastir, and then crosses the Black Sea to Old Fort. The hardships of the earliest days; the misery and horrors of the cholera campaign; the terrible losses of the French in the expedition to the Dobrudja; the splendid armament which descended upon the Crimea, not to return until the stronghold of Russia was in ashes; the sufferings before the first battle, and the first sight of the enemy, with the "Cain-like" sensation to which it gave rise, are well and vividly described in a narrative not unfrequently dashed with humour, or softened with pathos. At length the Allies come up to the foe.

> See, where rank on rank,
> Yon massy phalanx forms across Alma's bank.
> Then the dread rush—the fierce and deadly close;
> Death's ghastly harvest reaped by grappling foes;
> The fearful forefield cast; and Alma's name
> Henceforth emblazoned on our scrolls of fame.

But even with the glorious victory the lecturer does not pause. He concludes his address with a description of the terrors of the battle-field after the fight is done—terrors, as he mentioned, rendered all the greater by the improvements in the deadly missiles of modern war. The shell, rocket, and conical ball let leave more hideous traces than the old "spheres of war," and the wonder as well as the compassion of the spectator of a fought field is excited at the view of the ghastly injuries [illegible] frame can sustain, and yet retain the spirit of life.

With a picture of this kind, as near grimness as is suited to the mode of treatment and to the audience, Mr. Russell brings his lecture to an end somewhat as moonlight and slow music sometimes finish a tragic play. The audience required a few moments before they could sufficiently recover from the effect to give the artist his reward in a storm of plaudits.

William Howard Russell (whose portrait we have engraved upon the previous page) was born near Dublin, in the year 1821, and is descended from one of those English families, which, settling in Ireland whilst it was yet convulsed by the struggles of the old Celtic race against the yoke of their conquerors, became Hibernis ipsis Hiberniores. By his mother's side, however, he has the privileges of Irishry," and inherits the Milesian blood of the Kellys of Kildare.

The branch of his family settled in Limerick became involved in the troubles of the years before the Union, and their removal to Dublin did not mend their circumstances. However, they were not altogether unknown in literature and the arts. One grand-uncle, James Russell, was a member of the Royal Academy, and enjoyed, in the days of George IV., some distinction as a portrait-painter—marred by one defect—he never finished any of his portraits. Another relative, John Russell, the present Archdeacon of Clogher, is a man of fine literary powers; and a work of his, called "Walle's Remains," which has gone through very many editions, is distinguished by the hearty simplicity of its style.

William Howard Russell is the only survivor of the children of John Russell and Mary Kelly. His next brother, John Howard, died at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he had given promise of great capacity and ripe scholarship. Frederick died young, while studying at Wiesbaden, and the fourth son never reached boyhood.

The principal part of his education was received at the excellent school of the Rev. Edward J. Geoghegan, in Rume-street, Dublin, and he entered Trinity College under the nurturing of the Rev. Dr. Sadleir in 1838. But his studies were interrupted at the end of his third year by the death of his grandfather, who had hitherto supplied him with funds, and he was thrown on his own resources. Just at this time Mr. Robert Walter Russell, who was distantly related to his family, came over to Ireland to superintend the arrangements connected with the forthcoming elections for the Times, with which he had been long connected, and he proposed to Mr. Russell to describe the proceedings at the Longford election. The notices he wrote on that and similar occasions were made the subject of leaders in the great journal, and he received such encouragement from the managers as induced him to prepare himself for the new career, and to enter upon the varied duties of a member of the London press. Mr. Russell has continued on the staff of the Times, with one short interval, from his first connection with the press until the present time. He was entered of the Middle Temple in 1846, and was called to the Bar after the usual terms of roast-mutton and port had been complied with and accomplished.

He is not a member of any circuit, but he has held briefs as Parliamentary counsel in election cases, and attended Westminster for some years with more assiduity than success. When the Guards sailed for Malta, Mr. Russell—who had earned some reputation for descriptive power on account of many articles in the Times relating to great public ceremonials, the monster meetings, Royal progresses, Marine views, and subjects of greater gravity—consented to proceed to the East for the purpose of recording any matters of interest which might arise there; and did not return till the end of that great [illegible] in the Crimea, every event of which he witnessed and described. While he was home the University of Dublin conferred on him the degree of LL.D. He has since then visited Russia, and described the coronation of the Czar. At Moscow he received many marks of attention from the authorities, and was introduced to the Princes Gortschakoff, to Prince Metschikoff, General Osten Sacken, General Luders, and all the Muscovite celebrities of the war; and subsequently he followed the track of their armies in the Crimea, by Perekop, revisited Simpferopol, Bagtcheserai, Belaklava, the old battle-fields, and Sebastopol, returning by Berezlaw, Kherson, Nikolaiev, and Odessa, and thence journeying across Bessarabia and the Bukowina to Lemberg, in Galicia. Mr. Russell married Mary, the second daughter of the late Peter Burrowes, of Dublin, and has a family of two boys and two girls.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Marquis of BREADALBANE informed the House of her Majesty's gracious reply to the address of condolence.

POISONS AND LICENTIOUS PERIODICALS.—Lord CAMPBELL called the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the necessity of further regulations for the sale of poisons. He also wished to mention the diffusion of another poison, far more fatal than strychnine or prussic acid. He meant those cheap licentious publications with which the town was flooded. He thought it was the duty of the Government to take immediate steps to suppress this growing evil. The LORD CHANCELLOR said that those legislative enactments which existing were quite sufficient to put these nuisances down. With regard to the sale of poisons, the subject was receiving the attention of the Government.

The LORD CHANCELLOR laid on the table the Testamentary and Divorce Bills, which were subsequently read a first time, to pass at once through all its stages.

In reply to Lord Campbell, who said that if the Testamentary Bill were identical with that passed last Session he should oppose it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR stated that the new Court of Probate would be entirely separated from the Court of Chancery and Chancery Judges.

The bills were then read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time that day week.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

Mr. LABOUCHERE, in reply to Sir John Pakington, explained the circumstances under which the convention relating to the Newfoundland fisheries had been concluded with France, and had become inoperative owing to the refusal of the colony to sanction it.

SAVINGS-BANKS.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee on Savings-banks,

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in moving a resolution "That it is expedient to amend the laws relating to savings-banks, and to provide for the establishment of savings-banks with the security of the Government" stated the principal points of difference between the bill which he meant to found upon the resolution and the bill of last Session. He proposed, he said, by the present bill that the Government should assume the entire responsibility for the moneys of the depositors in the banks, and this obligation rendered it necessary that ample securities should be taken against fraud. He was ready to meet any reasonable necessary restrictions, but he trusted that the House would support him in guarding the public interests. At present, he, the local authorities, the trustees and managers of savings-banks, opposed these necessary securities, there would be only one course—namely, to abandon the bill, and to leave the system as it was. He intended likewise to introduce clauses into the bill prohibiting any private individual or company from establishing a bank under the title of a "savings-bank."

Sir H. WILLOUGHBY stated at some length his objections to what he considered the mischievous practice of allowing the Chancellor of the Exchequer to use the stock of the savings-banks for the purposes of the State in carrying on operations of finance. He maintained that the law gave the Chancellor of the Exchequer no right to touch one farthing of this money. He suggested a consolidation of the law, and that the subject should be submitted to a Select Committee.

Mr. H. HERBERT hoped the Government would not abandon that part of the proposed bill which provided securities against fraud.

Mr. ESTCOURT approved the principle of the proposed bill, except that part which removed the existing restriction upon the amount of deposits to £100.

Lord GODERICH joined with Sir H. Willoughby in urging the Chancellor of the Exchequer to refer the subject, respecting which he proposed to legislate upon a new principle, to a Select Committee, where the whole case might be considered and consulted.

Mr. T. BARING did not think the managers of savings-banks would object to well-defined checks contained in the bill; but they would feel a repugnance to a discretionary power being lodged in the hands of the National Debt Commissioner.

Mr. SLANEY spoke in commendation of the proposed measure.

Mr. HENLEY thought that the securities and conditions to which the banks were to be subjected should be laid upon the table and discussed. He thought, too, that the matter suggested by Sir H. Willoughby, the dealing with savings-banks stock, was worthy of the consideration of the House.

Mr. CROSSLEY wished the bill to be referred to a Select Committee.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, replied to the objections, and the resolution was then agreed to

TRANSPORTATION AND PENAL SERVITUDE.

Sir G. GREY, in moving the second reading of the Transportation and Penal servitude bill, explained its main provisions. It proposed, he said, to abolish the sentence of transportation, and to substitute that of penal servitude for a more extended period, so that convicts might be sent to a colony willing to receive, and which possessed means of employing them. He anticipated the objection that if some convicts sentenced to penal servitude were selected to be sent abroad, whilst others were retained at home, it would produce uncertainty in the nature of the punishment, observing that uncertainty had entered quite as much into the former system of transportation. The bill would not alter the power of granting tickets of leave, as a general rule

Mr BENTINCK believed that convict labour, which was now wasted, might, by means of penal settlements near home, be so applied as to pay the expenses of the convicts, with great advantage to them as well as to the country, by their employment upon harbours of refuge and other public works. He moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. ROEBUCK observed that the great cause of crime in this country was the difficulty of finding employment, which tainted labour could not find, so that when a man proved to be a convict he was driven back to crime. There was, in his opinion, but one remedy. —that of transporting all who were sentenced to transportation for life to some now uninhabited spot, after qualifying the convict by previous probation to become a colonist.

Sir J. PAKINGTON observed that the subject was full of difficulties, but the measure of the Government, which, as far as possible, met conflicting views, had his approbation; his only objection to it was the element of uncertainty it imported into the sentences

Mr. LABOUCHERE insisted that the bill did not preclude the adoption of the plan proposed by Mr. Bentinck. The uncertainty complained of was only as to place, not time; and there must be a power of selection, which would be best left in the hands of the Government

Mr. DRUMMOND contended that transportation had been mismanaged—that the only way of dealing with our criminals was to carry out a system of transportation to a greater extent than heretofore, and there could be no difficulty in finding places to send them to Mr BUNG thought the grant of tickets of leave, though unpopular, if used with discretion and forbearance, should not be discontinued. He supported the second reading of the bill.

Mr. NEWDEGATE likewise supported the bill, which, he hoped, would be a step to a renewal of transportation

The second reading of the bill was supported by Mr. Ewart and Mr. Liddell

Mr HENLEY condemned the legislation of the last few years upon this subject, and observed that the House was now asked to reverse what it had done—changing, however, the well-understood term of transportation to that of penal servitude.

Mr. BAINES, after defending the Government from some remarks made by Mr. Henley, observed, in reply to Mr Drummond, that, in the opinion of a Committee of that House, however great the advantages of transportation, it was difficult, if not impossible, to point out any place to which convicts could be sent

Mr WHITESIDE believed that the people of this country would never consent to alter a law which permitted the Judge to pronounce one sentence and the Government to substitute another and a severer punishment

Mr. KEARSING and Mr. PACKE supported the bill, though with certain qualification—

Lord STANLEY said the question was not whether transportation was desirable or not, but whether it was possible, and his opinion was that any attempt to found a new penal settlement in any part of the globe would end in disappointment. With reference to the corrigible class of criminals, he thought the ticket-of-leave system had in reality never had a fair trial; the theory was one thing, but the practice had been another.

Mr HOPE expressed a general approbation of the bill, which enacted, he believed, one great truth, that a convicted criminal forfeited his time and his labour to the country, which might turn it to use either at home or abroad

Mr MARSH suggested that a convict settlement might be established in the northern part of Australia

The bill was then read a second time.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS

Mr. ADDERLEY moved the second reading of the Industrial Schools Bill, which he said was verbatim the same as had been recommitted pro forma in the last Parliament. He stated briefly the object of the bill, which was a supplement or complement to the Reformatory Acts. He anticipated and replied to an objection that it was a proselytising measure.

Mr. BOWYER opposed the bill, on two grounds—first, that it introduced principles new to the law of the country, and interfered with the parental authority of the poor; secondly, that the effect, though not the intention, of the measure was to proselytize, since Roman Catholic children would be sent to Protestant schools

Lord R. CECIL defended the bill

Mr. PAKE, not dissenting from the principle of the bill, protested against the levying a compulsory rate upon the agricultural parishes for the purposes of the bill.

Mr. BARROW opposed the bill, on the ground that it sanctioned an interference with parental authority which ought not to be tolerated, and because the provisions of the bill went beyond the necessity of the case.

Sir G. GREY said the bill required careful consideration in Committee; but he [illegible] there would be no objection to reading it a second time.

The bill was strongly opposed by Mr. BRADY and Mr. F. O'BRIEN.

Mr. STANHOPE heartily approved the principle of the bill, though he did not pledge himself to all the details

After a few words from Mr. RIDLEY, upon a division the second reading was carried by 177 to 18.

THE CURRENCY.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved for the reappointment of the Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Bank Act of 1844 (7th and 8th Victoria, cap 32), and of the Bank Acts for Ireland and Scotland of 1845 (8th and 9th Victoria, cap. 38).

Mr. MALINS complained of the delay of legislation upon this subject, and of the derangement of mercantile transactions by the existing law. He hoped the Government would lose no time in bringing in some measure to correct the evils of the Act of 1844

Mr HANKEY contended that the Act of 1844 had nothing to do with the high rate of interest, and that cause had been found could ton

Mr. HUDSON was of opinion that a Committee was useless, and that the Government should at once legislate upon the subject

Mr. AYRTON observed that there was no necessity for legislation, unless the House was of opinion that there should be an alteration of the Bank Charter, and he protested against any hasty legislation on the subject.

The motion was agreed to

Sir G. GREY obtained leave to bring in a bill to make other provision for the exercise of the powers of the General Board of Health; and Mr. FITZGERALD a bill to Consolidate and Amend the Acts relating to Bankruptcy and Insolvency in Ireland.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply to an appeal from the Bishop of Oxford, declared he would postpone the second reading of the Divorce Bill, which is fixed for Tuesday next

The Earl of CARNARVON moved for papers connected with the alleged persecution of the Hong-Kong by the Chinese, and with the treatment of prisoners arrested on suspicion. After some discussion, in which Lords Harrowby, Malmesbury, and Ellenborough took part, the motion was agreed to

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY

CENTRAL AMERICA.—Lord PALMERSTON, in reply to Mr. Wyld, stated that her Majesty's Government had stationed, or was about to station, on the coast of America such a naval force as they thought necessary for the protection of British interests; but he, the noble minister, gave an explanation of the state of affairs on the Isthmus of Panama, respecting which, he said, her Majesty's Government had been in communication with that of the United States. He was glad to say that Government professed the most just and honourable intentions, and disclaimed any design of taking possession of territory.

ASSAULTS UPON WOMEN AND CHILDREN. Mr. DILLWYN moved for leave to bring in a bill to repeal the Act 14th and 17th of Victoria, cap. 30, and to [illegible] further provision for the prevention and punishment of Aggravated Assaults upon Women and Children, and for preventing delay and expense in the administration of certain parts of the criminal law. He referred to cases before police-courts to show what was meant by "aggravated assaults," which the existing law, he considered was incompetent to repress, and he proposed to substitute flogging in lieu of imprisonment, as the only punishment that would, in his opinion, really stop these offences.—Sir G. GREY, while fully expressing his confidence in the efficiency of the proposed remedy, offered no opposition to the introduction of the bill. Mr. Dillwyn had, he said, unjustly assumed that the Act now in force had been inoperative; but he believed, on the contrary, that it had a very beneficial effect, and worked well. Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

A NEW BEER BILL. The House having resolved itself into a Committee on the Beer Acts, Mr. HARDY moved that the Chairman do move for leave to bring in a bill to amend the Laws relating to the general Sale of Beer by Retail, and to regulate certain Places of public resort, refreshment, and entertainment—the main object of which, he said, was to require that licenses for [illegible] should be granted by magistrates in the same way as public-houses.—Mr. K. SEYMER did not object to the introduction of the bill, but he should, he said, oppose the second reading upon principle, considering it a species of monopoly or Free-trade.—Sir J. PAKINGTON suggested that this subject should be taken up by the Government. Sir G. GREY did not oppose the motion, but felt that the remedy proposed to be applied would not be an efficient one; the subject should, he observed, be carefully dealt with, and if the bill was the same as that of the last Parliament he was bound to oppose it. The motion was agreed to, and leave was given to bring in the bill.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATIONS.—Mr. L. KING moved for leave to bring in a bill to abolish property qualifications for members of Parliament.—Lord PALMERSTON said he thought it had been the understanding of the House that all questions connected with the representation should be postponed until next Session. At the same time, if Mr King was desirous of bringing before the House the ideas he intended to embody in his bill he would not oppose its introduction; but he hoped Mr. King would be content to let it lie upon the table for consideration in the interval between this and the ensuing Session —Leave was then given to introduce the bill, and, after some further business, the House adjourned.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

Its population, which was 6499 in 1832, had risen at the last Census to 6573; but its registered electors showed a small decrease from 661 to 653. He supported Ministers on the China question, and voted for the Maynooth grant.

Its constituency formerly consisted of the freemen only, to which the Reform Act added the £10 householders within the old city limits, and some adjoining districts. Its population, which was 11,823 in 1831, had risen at the last census to 12,536; and its registered electors showed a increase from 1043 to 1363. Since the Reform Act the Northern Division (or parts of Lindsey) has been represented by Lord Worsley (now Earl of Yarborough), Mr. T. G. Corbett, the late Sir W. Ingilby, Mr. R. A. 2. MR. ANTHONY WILLSON (whose name originally was Peacock), a Conservative, and a member of the Church of England, but in favour of religious liberty and reduction of taxation. Would have voted for Mr. Cobden's motion had he been in Parliament.

LISKEARD.—This borough first returned two members to Parliament in 1295, but was deprived of one member by the Reform Act. Its constituency formerly consisted of the freemen only, to which the Reform Act added the £10 householders, extending the limits of the borough to the entire parish. Its population, which was 1042 in 1832, had risen at the last Census to 1242; and its registered electors showed an increase from 218 to 242. By Lord John Russell's Reform Bill of 1832, it was proposed to increase the constituency by joining to the borough the parishes of Pelynt, Lanreath, and Duloe, but was rejected on the motion of Mr. Protheroe. Among its more noted members may be mentioned the historian Gibbon, the Right Hon W. Huskisson, and the Right Hon. C. P. Yorke. Since the Reform Act it has been represented by the late Lord Seymour, Mr. Charles Buller, Mr. Justice Crowder, and by its present member.

MR. RALPH WM. GREY, a Liberal, he is in favour of the Maynooth grant. Has been Private Secretary to the late Lord Sydenham, Lord J. Russell, and Viscount Palmerston, as well as to the Poor-law Board. LIVERPOOL.—This borough first returned two members to Parliament in 1295, but continued to do so for a long interval afterwards, down to the nineteenth century. Its constituency formerly consisted of the freemen, who are only gradually becoming extinct by death, and to whom the Reform Act added the £10 householders. Its population, which was 165,176 in 1831, had risen at the last Census to 376,065; and its registered electors showed an increase from 11,283 to 17,433. Among its more noted members may be mentioned Mr. Wm. Roscoe, the Right Hon. George Canning, and the Right Hon. W. Huskisson. Since the Reform Act it has been represented by Mr. W. # THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 860.—VOL. XXX.] SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1857. [WITH A SUPPLEMENT, FIVEPENCE.

THE BRITISH BANK CONSPIRATORS.

THE extraordinary disclosures made before the Court of Bankruptcy by the Directors and some of the servants of the Royal British Bank have already given an immortality of infamy to that gigantic conspiracy to defraud. The judgment of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, in which he hands over the case to be dealt with by the Criminal Tribunals of the country, is a model of forensic reasoning. Clear, emphatic, and exhaustive, it reflects the highest honour on the honesty and ability of the learned functionary who delivered it; and, when contrasted with the weak and uncertain utterance of the Attorney-General, inspires regret that the Court of Bankruptcy has not the power to deal with the persons implicated, and to commit them for trial to the Central Criminal Court, without reference to Sir Richard Bethell. It is of course possible that the last-named functionary, in seeing difficulties where other people see none, and in feeling doubts where plainer and less learned persons have the strongest convictions, is but making evident to meaner capacities that he possesses more wisdom than falls to the lot of ordinary mortals. But if, after due reflection, he decline to prosecute the promoters, directors, and managers of the fraudulent confederacy to which his attention has been so forcibly drawn, it is equally possible—at all events, let us hope so—that the anger and disappointment of the public at the escape of such offenders will lead o an immediate amendment of the law, or to the appointing of a public prosecutor, more fit to deal with similar cases than a mere Attorney-General. Such a functionary is much needed, and would not, we should think, after the failure of Sir Richard Bethell, be chosen from amongst the members of the Chancery Bar, however eminent or however able they may be. Robbery, like murder, is a very simple business, which any juryman can thoroughly understand, and need not be encumbered with the nicetes and hair-splittings of the Equity Courts. Trusting, however, that Sir Richard Bethell may speedily put an end to his doubts, and see reason to walk in the path indicated to him by the solemn judgment of the Bankruptcy Court, no less than by the public opinion which approves and ratifies it, we proceed to consider the admirable bill of indictment which has been sketched against the active and passive agents of the fraud by Mr. Commissioner Holroyd.

On a review of the whole evidence brought forward by Mr. Linklater, who has established for himself a very enviable reputation by his conduct of the inquiry, the Commissioner shows in no less than six different forms in what way the directors and others have rendered themselves liable to the penalties attendant on a glaring infraction of the criminal law. Freed from the legal arguments by which they were severally introduced, and of the authorities by which they were supported, the six counts of the indictments are—

First.—Commencing business before all the shares were subscribed for, and at least half the amount paid up, and repaying part of the sum paid up without leave of the Board of Trade—contrary to the form of the statute, and the terms of the charter.

Second.—Making, declaring, and publishing false statements and balance-sheets of the assets and liabilities of the bank, and of the amounts and nature of the capital and property and value thereof, and of the profits and losses of the company—thereby concealing the actual state and position of the affairs of the corporation, and giving a semblance of solvency where the reality had ceased to exist, and sending false reports and balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts to the proprietors, in violation of the articles.

Third.—Declaring dividends when no profits had been made; but, on the contrary, when the affairs of the corporation were greatly embarrassed, and large losses had been incurred, and when—according to the terms of the charter—not a single farthing ought to have been allowed for such purpose.

Fourth.—Conspiring to raise the price of the shares of the company by illegal means and with a criminal view.

Fifth.—Conspiring when in a state of insolvency, and when the losses of the company had exhausted the "surplus or reserve fund" and one-fourth of the paid-up capital, to obtain a supplemental charter from the Crown by false representations and by false reports and balance-sheets and making dividends when not justified in so doing, and thereupon issuing new shares, or obtaining deposits for new shares at a premium, with intent cheat the public, and in contempt of the prerogative of the Crown.

Sixth.—Making such repeated gross misapplications of the funds of the bank by large loans to some of the directors and other persons on terms of the utmost risk, in total disregard of the discretion vested in the directors by the charter, with consequent serious loss to the corporation; embarking in a hazardous speculation by laying out large sums of the bank money upon an undertaking quite foreign to the business of banking, and thereby also incurring heavy losses; not exercising proper superintendence and control over the general manager in conducting the business and affairs of the company; and, though the directors found that the losses of the company had exhausted all the "surplus or reserved fund," and also one-fourth of the capital actually paid up, failing to call a special general meeting of the proprietors, and to submit to the meeting a statement of the affairs of the company as directed by the 71st article of the deed of constitution—all which several instances of misconduct were in direct violation of the terms of the charter.

After so admirably complete a summary of the law and facts of the case, the Attorney-General ought to see clearly where the finger-post directs. In all cases of conspiracy to defraud he is the proper officer to prosecute. He is the guardian not only of the rights of individuals, but of the prerogative of the Crown—both of which have been invaded by the great and the little rogues, and the lazy and good-natured screeners of rogues, who mismanaged the Royal British Bank, and ruined many, and defrauded many more, of its unhappy shareholders. The voice of the public already declares that his hesitating to move, where moving seems so palpable a duty, has sensibly damaged his legal reputation, done much to discourage honest men, and, possibly, to encourage many a banking or joint-stock knave, whose delinquencies have not yet been discovered, and who is now studying from the history of the Royal British Bank how to keep on the windy side of the law, how to rob without being treated as a robber, or how to swindle and defraud for large sums, without incurring the vulgar punishment of those who meanly pick pockets at a fair or in the crush-room of the Opera. If Cameron, Brown, and their fellow-conspirators escape, public opinion will hold that Paul, Strahan, and Bates were harshly dealt with, and that British law is as much a delusion, a snare, and a farce as the piety of the pious manager of Tokenhouse-yard, or the honesty of his obedient directors, who put their names to lies which they knew to be lies; who either unblushingly plundered the till, or in a more roundabout manner obtained money under the falsest pretences and on the most worthless securities; or who allowed others to do so without an effort at prevention.

There needs a great example. It is the impunity of monster delinquents that encourages the smaller fry. It cannot, we are afraid, be denied that the commercial morality of British traders, both of high and low degree, is not as spotless as it used to be. Within the last ten years there has been a woful deterioration. There are, no doubt, many thousands—or hundreds of thousands—of commercial men still amongst us whose words are as good as their bonds; who would scorn to defraud their neighbour of a farthing; and who look upon trade and commerce as not inconsistent with the feelings of gentlemen and the duties of Christians; but there are far too many amongst us who have no such high standard of morality by which to regulate their commercial dealings. The railway mania of 1845-46 betrayed a rottenness painful to contemplate; and from time to time the symptoms of the same disease display themselves in the most unexpected quarters. The tradesmen who adulterate their goods, or give short weight and measure; the linendrapers who cheat ladies into the purchase of inferior finery at a superior price; the venders of slop furniture, slop raiment, and slop everything; the getters-up of sham insurance offices, thieving joint-stock companies, and swindling banks—all share in one common delinquency;—all degrade the character of the British merchant, which at one time stood the highest in the world. It is people like these, especially when they go unpunished, who spread abroad the belief, among the lower as well as the upper classes, that the character of our middle classes becomes worse and more corrupt every day. The belief may be only partially justified by the facts, but let the middle classes look to it. They are the principal depositories of political power; and if the existing laws be not sufficiently stringent or comprehensive to meet the case of the British Bank swindlers, and to make of them the example which public morality requires, it is for them, by the exercise of their political influence, to force the not unwilling Government so to amend the law as to prevent the scandal of such impunity in all future time. No country can be in a safe or wholesome condition where the law is merely strong enough to punish the small offenders who steal shillings, but powerless against men who have had the management of thousands. When it is felt, too, that men who sit in Parliament to make laws for others break these laws in their own persons, the danger to society becomes as great at the scandal. The adequate punishment of a Cameron or a James Sadleir would at the present moment have a more beneficial effect upon the minds of millions of honest Englishmen than the capture and punishment of a thousand of the petty rogues and ticket-of-leave men who daily try the patience of the police and the wisdom of the Home Secretary. If the Attorney-General believe that the law, as it at present stands, is not flexible or strong enough to catch such offenders, let him so declare it without a moment's delay, and the Session is quite young enough to permit of the remedy. It will be strange indeed if, in a commercial country, the law can punish all kinds and degrees of knavery;—except joint-stock knavery, which is the most nefarious of all; and it will not be easy to convince the people that, if the law were in earnest, it could not catch the big thief as easily as the little one.

SCREW ENGINES OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

MANUFACTURED BY MESSRS. JAMES WATT AND CO.

WE this week give a photographic representation of the screw engines manufactured by Messrs. James Watt and Co., for the steamer Great Eastern, and which are the largest and most powerful engines ever yet constructed.

There are four cylinders, each of eighty-four inches diameter, for driving the screw of this vessel. The length of the stroke is four feet, and the makers reckon that the engines will make about forty-five revolutions per minute. The cylinders lie on their sides, as is a common arrangement in screw engines: the piston-rods protrude through the ends of the cylinders nearest that central shaft on the end of which the screw is hung, and the connecting rods attached to the piston-rods engage cranks in the screw shaft and turn it round just in the same manner as the arm turns round a grindstone. The pistons, which are solid plugs, pressed by the steam backwards and forwards in the cylinders, communicate their reciprocating movement through the medium of the piston-rods to the connecting rods; and in this way the screw shaft is turned round, and the vessel is slowed forward in the water just as a screw auger is turned round advanced in a piece of wood, or a corkscrew in a cork.

The pressure of the steam in the boilers is 25lb. on each square inch. The total heating surface in the boilers of the screw engines is about 30,000 square feet. The nominal power of the screw engines is 1700-horse power; and, if they work up to four times their nominal power, which is not an unusual performance, the actual indicated power will be 6800-horse power. The area of that part of the cross section of the ship which falls beneath the water line is about 1000 square feet, when the vessel is drawing 26 feet of water. The estimated amount of water evaporated by the boilers of the screw engines per hour is 3130 cubic feet, and the area of the grate-bars is 1213 square feet.

The screw is formed with four blades. Its diameter is 24 feet, and its pitch or the distance which it would advance during each revolution if it worked in a solid body, like a corkscrew penetrating a cork, is 44 feet.

In addition to the screw, the vessel is supplied with paddle-wheels driven by four engines, each of 72 inches diameter of cylinder and 14 feet stroke, and raised collectively at 1000 nominal horses' power. If we suppose that these engines also work up to four times their nominalpower, it will be quite safe to reckon the actual power effective in propelling the vessel at 10,000 indicator horses' power.

It is a question of much interest to determine what amount of speed this power will impart to the vessel. Messrs. James Watt and Co.'s anticipation is that the speed of the vessel will be about seventeen miles an hour, and from that to eighteen miles seems to be about the limit engineers have ventured to predict. But we believe that these anticipations fall very far short of what the real speed will be, and which we do not hesitate to predict will turn out to be between twenty-four and twenty-five miles per hour. No allowance has been made in the existing computations of the speed for the great size of the vessel, yet it is well known that large vessels are more easily propelled, relatively with their proportion of power than small vessels, as is popularly manifested at every yacht race, where an allowance of time is made for the smallness of the vessels; and, in France, where the variation in the resistance consequent upon size has been carefully investigated, it is found that the velocities attained by similar vessels, but of different sizes, vary as the square root of any linear dimension. A vessel, therefore, of twice the length of the Himalaya, and with four times the sectional area and four times the power, will be faster than the Himalaya in the proportion of the square root of 2 to the square root of 1, or 1·4 times; so that the Great Eastern, had she been built of the same sizes as the Himalaya, has proportion of power enough to attain a speed of seventeen miles an hour, as we will, with her existing dimensions, be 1.4 times faster, or go 23 8, nearly 24, miles an hour. By reckoning the resistance as proportionate to the immersed perimeter, the speed comes out as twenty-three miles. At the increased speed, however, the engines, if duly supplied with steam, will develop more power than at the computed speed, so that, in all probability, a speed of close upon twenty-five statute miles per hour will be attained.

The existing mode of estimating the resistance by the area of the immersed midship section is erroneous, except in the comparison of vessels of similar dimensions. It is in putting into motion a column of water by friction that the power of the engine in well-formed vessels is chiefly expended, and the magnitude of this column depends, not upon the area of the cross section, but the amount of rubbing surface it offers to the water. The resistance of rivers is measured by the length of the outline in the cross section of the bed; and large rivers, with the same declivity, run much more swiftly than small. In like manner it should be by the immersed perimeter of the cross section that the resistance of ships should be measured, and when this is done it will be seen how very much less is the proportionate resistance of large vessels. A speed of thirty miles an hour in steam vessels is not, we are persuaded, very distant of attainment. Nor does it appear probable that at high velocities the resistance will be found to increase at the same rapid rate as at low. It is the adhesion of the water which at low speeds consumes power, and this adhesion moves the contiguous water because it is easier to do so than for the vessel to pass over it as if rubbing on a solid. But as with every increase of speed a thicker film of water adheres, the resistance occasioned by moving this mass of water will gradually become so great that it will be easier for the vessel to rub over the film than to drag it with her; and when this takes place the friction will thereafter follow the law which obtains in the case of solid bodies, and the resistance will no longer increase as the square of the velocity. At what point the equilibrium between the adhesion and the friction will be attained is a question which experiment must determine; but the apprehension of the fact that it will be attained at some determinable velocity gives warrant for the expectation of higher rates of speed in steam navigation than has heretofore been thought possible of attainment.

The success of the Great Eastern as a commercial enterprise depends mainly upon her capability of realising some such speed as twenty-five miles an hour. With such a speed she can command employment on any station, and can also compel the Government to give her a subvention for carrying the mails. With such an ordinary rate of speed as sixteen or seventeen miles an hour her commercial success is far more problematical. Moreover, with so large a cost a vital element is time. She must neither be a day longer on the voyage nor a day longer in harbour than is absolutely indispensable, but must be driven at such a rate as to make the capital productive. Taking the cost at £500,000, and the interest and depreciation at only ten per cent upon this amount, we have about £1000 a week of expense from this source alone. The actual amount chargeable to this item will be very much more than is here reckoned, but the approximation is sufficient to show the importance of attaining and maintaining high speeds on this sole inducement. Of the twenty-five miles an hour we have no doubt whatever, if there is the steam; and the boilers will produce the steam if the draught is sufficient. In most steam-vessels the draught is too sluggish, and the heat in the furnaces is not sufficiently intense. It has been proposed to use anthracite coal in the Great Eastern, but this is an experiment, and Welsh coals can be more safely depended on. The bridges at the ends of the furnaces should be high, so as to retain a high temperature in the furnace, which both consumes the coal more effectively and compels more of the heat to enter the water in the region of the furnaces—thus leaving less work for the tubes or flues to do. There should be good steam jets in the chimneys, so as to ensure a strong draught. With these simple precautions we have no fear of the speed; and, as the vessel is the strongest vessel ever sent to sea, there can be no doubt of her complete seaworthiness. The auxiliary engines for turning the screw round when the screw engines are not at work are, in our judgment, unnecessary; and every engine or piece of machinery not absolutely necessary is a complication and disparagement. Simplicity and fewness of parts to look after and keep in repair is a most important desideratum in steam navigation. Transcendentalism will not work in such a sphere, and in our judgment some of the refinements introduced into the Great Eastern might have been advantageously omitted. But in all its main features there can be no doubt, whatever of the soundness of the design or of the excellence of the execution, while we believe that the performance of the vessel will exceed everything which the most sanguine supporters of the enterprise have ventured to anticipate, and will far outrun the prognostications which engineers, overlooking the element of size, have hitherto formed.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE Royal Artillery off duty were on Monday last drawn up on the review-ground at Woolwich to be inspected and divided in anticipation of a visit from the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia to Woolwich garrison. The Royal Marine band went through a thorough field-day's exercise.

ON Wednesday last the Duke of Cambridge reviewed the troops at Chatham. The whole of the troops in the garrison, consisting of the corps of the Royal Engineers, with their band, under command of Major Robertson, forming eight companies, marched from their barracks at nine o'clock to the great lines at Chatham, and took up their position, with the Engineer field train, on the right of the line of battle. These were followed by the depôts of 24 regiments, comprising the Provisional Battalion, forming two battalions, each battalion containing about 1300 bayonets. The whole force under arms was upwards of 6000 men, formed in two wings of the different corps, amounting to upwards of 1000 more, were stationed in the rear. The line of troops under arms extended about a mile. Shortly after eleven the Royal Highness, accompanied by Major-General Jutant-General, Colonel Forster, and his Royal Highness' Aide-de-Camp, Colonel Tyrwhitt, with Colonel Sandham, Colonel Savage, and many other officers, entered on the lines on horseback from the Lines Road; and, after riding some distance they came up to the troops, drawn up in line from east to west, forming four battalions, under command of Colonel Eden. After going through various evolutions, which the troops performed in a highly creditable manner, for nearly two hours, under a broiling sun, his Royal Highness, at the close of the proceedings, had all the officers and they forming a square, the Duke addressed them. He said it was very satisfactory to him to be enabled to state that since his last visit considerable progress had been made in the discipline and drill of the troops under their command. With regard to the corps of Royal Marines (Light Infantry), he must say that they were in most perfect order of discipline, and he could assure them that they merited the highest reward of praise he could bestow, and they have fully sustained the high character they had hitherto borne. The noble Duke then dismissed the officers; and the men of the two battalions of the line having formed into separate close columns, they were addressed by his Royal Highness, who said he was very much gratified with their appearance, and the manner in which they had executed the various movements gave him very considerable satisfaction. His Royal Highness left the garrison under a salute of twenty one guns, for Maidstone, by the 5.20 down train, having paid a high compliment to Colonel Eden on the efficient state of the garrison and the troops.

THE Third Battalion of the 60th Royal Rifles (under orders for India) being below its prescribed establishment, 87 men of the First Battalion at Chatham have been transferred to that corps, and are under orders to join that battalion at Dublin.

THE Admiralty State yacht, Osborne, is ordered to leave Portsmouth on Monday for Cherbourg, to be in attendance upon his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Constantine, whom she will embark on the evening of the 28th inst., with suite of sixteen Aides de camp, for Osborne. At present the arrangement is for the Grand Duke and Staff to leave late on the evening of the 28th, so as to arrive at Osborne early on the morning of the 29th.

The Adventure and Assistance, iron steam troop-ships, embarked their respective allotments of troops for China on Wednesday at Portsmouth. These consisted of seven companies of the 82nd Regiment in the Assistance, and three companies of the same and three companies of the 23rd Royal Welsh Fusiliers in the Adventure.

The workmen of Holland (says a letter from the Hague, in the Emancipation of Brussels) are striking all over the country for an increase of wages. The men working on the Canal of Wedninge have struck and picketed the public-houses along the canal. Troops have been sent from Fort Batta to maintain order.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PRUSSIA AND SWITZERLAND.

M. Hatzfeldt, the Prussian Ambassador at Paris, is said to have received such final instructions on the Neufchatel question as will enable him to sign the Convention proposed by the Allied Representatives.

It is now said that the compensation clause was only retained so long in order to induce Switzerland to other concessions, but, when it was found they could not be obtained, his Majesty struck out the compensation as unworthy his dignity.

The bases of the treaty are precisely those published by the Bund, saving some very slight deviations. The representatives of the interested Powers were to place their signatures to the articles of treaty on Friday (yesterday) at the latest.

RATIFICATION OF THE TREATY WITH PERSIA.

The Moniteur announces, on the authority of despatches from Constantinople, that the Treaty of Peace between England and Persia was ratified at Teheran on the 14th of April, and forwarded to Bagdad on the 17th.

The news of a treaty having been concluded reached Mohammerah on the 6th of April, and military operations under Sir James Outram were of course suspended.

THE DANUBIAN PRINCIPALITES.

The intention of postponing indefinitely the elections in the Danubian Provinces has been abandoned in consequence of the representations addressed by the representatives of the Western Powers to the Kaimakans of Moldavia and Wallachia, and that the elections will take place on the 16th of June. Letters from Constantinople of the 11th inst. mention the arrival in that city of an Attaché of the French Commission, M. de Talleyrand. Nothing positive had transpired as to the object of his journey, but it is generally supposed it relates to the events which have recently occurred in the Principalities. M. de Talleyrand's stay in Jassy was short. There only remained in that city the Austrian Commissioner, who appears to be on the best terms with the Kaimakan.

AMERICA.

A despatch from Washington, of the 4th inst., says that the rumour of the rejection by Great Britain of the Dallas Clarendon Treaty was confirmed by the receipt of a letter from Mr. Dallas to the President. Lord Napier was expected shortly to communicate the fact officially to the Government, when the subject would be considered by the Cabinet of Washington. So far as ascertained, not one of the members of the Cabinet regrets the rejection of the treaty. The Administration maintains that the British Government has failed to execute the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, and will insist upon its being carried out in good faith.

The Cabinet at Washington intend waiting for the next news from New Granada before they take any definite action relative to that country.

The foreign appointments are now under consideration at Washington. The President has determined to replace all the United States' ministers and agents abroad at the expiration of their four years' service, and has, it is said, resolved upon opening a new system of policy both at home and abroad.

The majority of the Select Committee of the Senate of Pennsylvania on the resolutions in the Dred Scott case had made a lengthy and able report, concluding that the resolutions declaring that the opinion of the Supreme Court enounced principles in palpable opposition to the judicial and legislative history of the Union, and in violation of the plain provisions of the constitution of the United States; that the opinion, except on the question of jurisdiction, being delivered in a case over which the Court admitted it had no jurisdiction, may be justly regarded as obite dicta and inoperative as law; that the five Judges who concurred in the same opinion made a wanton attack on the sovereignty of the Free States and an impotent attempt to nullify the established laws of the country, and, by extra judicial action, caused unnecessary excitement in the public mind in regard to the subject of slavery, and had thereby forfeited the confidence and respect due to their exalted station.

The United States' Marshal has seized another vessel at New York which was fitting out for the slave trade.

The trial for the murder of Dr Burdell at New York has commenced. The brig Cunningham and her supposed paramour, Eckell, the two persons charged with the murder, are to be tried separately.

A Pro-Slavery convention is to be held in Kansas on the 2nd July, but the Free-State men expect to defeat it. A large number of Southern men with their slaves are entering Kansas.

Advices from Nicaragua confirm the statement that Walker is in a precarious condition at Rivas. It is asserted that Spain is assisting the Costa Ricans against Walker.

Serious dissensions are reported to have broken out among the Mormons, both at San Bernardino and Salt Lake.

NEW GRANADA.

Despatches have been received from the French Consul at Panama. They give full details of the situation of the country. It would appear from these accounts that New Granada is not capable of resisting the invasion prepared by the Americans, who are likely to establish themselves without difficulty at Panama and Chagres.

IMPERIAL INTRIGUES IN THE PRINCIPALITIES.—A private letter from Bucharest informs me that, although the clubs have been dissolved, the spirit by which those bodies were animated has not been extinguished, and that the electoral agitation is much more formidable than it was before. The several commissioners were to continue their residence at Jassy a fortnight longer, in order that they might see with their own eyes the progress and the issue of the affair. There will be a strict investigation into the justice of the complaints that have been made. A demonstration took place at Jassy on the 26th of April, which induced the Kaimakan to forbid the repetition of such scenes. A crowd of men had assembled, who paraded the streets with the flags and banners of different countries, but there were other flags on which were emblazoned "The Union," "A Foreign Prince," "A Constitutional Government," and "Security for Self Government;" and they made the passengers greet these emblems with cheers and hurrahs. But in addition to this peaceful and even constitutional agitation, the letter states that a disgraceful kind of agitation is being got up by Austria. Hundreds of her agents are whetting the rage of the peasantry and others in Wallachia and Moldavia against the Boyards, of all this underhand work is because she finds the nobles are not to be gained over to her interests. She is accordingly planning their assassination and destruction—the same game which she played some years ago in her own province of Gallicia not to speak of the Banat. The commissioners are fully alive, it is said, to this latter kind of agitation; they know well the source it springs from; they are doing all they can to delay the formation, and they have advised the rural authorities to lay the strong hand of the law upon all such emissaries, wherever they may be found, and to consign them to the proper tribunals.—Constantinople Correspondent of the Daily News.

THE RUSSIANS IN CENTRAL ASIA.—From Central Asia we have no news of importance beyond the usual rumours. It is stated that a body of Russians, comprising four regiments, with twenty-four guns, had marched from Aga Mesjid to Kokand, and that the King of Bokhara is much troubled in consequence. The Russians strengthen and garrison every fort on the way. It is also reported that the Russians are about to send a force to Yankmeedan from Aga Mesjid. The ruler of Kokand sent a Vakeel to the Russians at Aga Mesjid, begging that he should be allowed to retain his authority, but subject to the Russians. He was well received and to recommend his master to dismiss all his troops as the country would be held by the Russians, that the request to be allowed to retain his authority would be forwarded to higher authority, and that most likely the Russians would be content with Mahomed Afzul Khan (at Balkh) has desired all his troops who wish to continue in service to send for their families from Cabul, and those who do not wish to serve to the Persian frontier. From his proceedings and their it is supposed that Afzul Khan is desirous of rebelling against Dost Mahomed, in accordance with the Russians. He has sent a Vakeel to Aga Mesjid, but the nature of his mission is not yet known.—Bombay Times.

THE HILL-ROBBERS OF INDIA.—News has been received of a most successful expedition on the frontier. The Boozdars, a tribe of Beloochees occupying the hills near Peshawur, have been giving trouble. A force of 1600 men was sent against them. In three days it entered their fastness, threaded a pass deemed impregnable, ascended the first range of the Suleimans, stormed all the hill stockades, and reduced a tribe soon 6 000 strong to absolute submission. The loss in killed and wounded on our side was about sixty.—Letter from Calcutta.

The French papers announce the death of the once famous police-agent, Vidocq.

GENERAL SIR JAMES MACDONNELL, K.C.B.

GENERAL SIR JAMES MACDONNELL, who died on the 15th inst., was a British soldier of high merit and distinction. He entered the Army in 1795; soon, while in the Coldstream Guards, he took part in the expedition to Naples and Calabria in 1805 and 1806, and subsequently pursued a brilliant military career in Portugal, Spain, France, and Flanders. It was at the battle of Waterloo, however, that Macdonnell won his brightest honours. He was then a Lieutenant-Colonel in the Guards, and was in the second brigade of the First Division, under General Sir J. Byng, now Field Marshal the Earl of Strafford. On the eve of the 18th of June it was decided that Lieut.-Colonel Macdonnell, with the second battalion of the Coldstream Guards, should have charge of the buildings of Hougoumont while Lord Saltoun should hold the orchard and the wood. The firm retaining of the position by Macdonnell and Saltoun against the impetuous and almost overwhelming force of the French; their own intrepid attacks, too, on the enemy at that important point, formed a brilliant episode of the battle, and are now matters of history. Colonel Macdonnell was wounded in the struggle. He received the earnest approbation of the Duke of Wellington. Macdonnell was created a K.C.H. in 1837, and a K.C.B. in 1838. He became a General in 1854. He had, in addition to the Waterloo medal, the gold medal for Maida, and the silver war medal and four clasps for Salamanca, Vittoria, Nivelle, and the Nive. He was also decorated with the order of Maria Theresa, and was a Knight (4th class) of St. Vladimir. From February, 1849, he held the Colonelcy of the 71st (Highland) Regiment of Foot. General Macdonnell was of the famous family of Macdonnell of Glengarry, which has flourished in Scotland from time immemorial, and of which almost every generation has produced at least one warrior. He was the third son of Duncan Macdonnell of Glengarry, and brother of James Ranaldson Macdonnell, Esq., the present representative of the house. The General's place of birth was the family seat in Inverness-shire.

MAJOR-GENERAL EVERARD.

MAJOR-GENERAL MATHIAS EVERARD, C.B. and K.H., died the 20th ult., at his residence at Southsea. This gallant and distinguished officer was born at Ramalstown, county Meath, the 1st May, 1790, and commenced his military career as an Ensign in the 2nd, or Queen's Royal, Regiment, in 1804. Two years afterwards he was selected to lead the forlorn hope at Monte Video, the party under his command on that occasion consisting of thirty-two men, non-commissioned officers and private—of whom twenty-two were either killed or wounded. Awarded, for this brilliant act, obtained a company in the 14th Regiment in April, 1807, was presented with a sword by the Patriotic Fund at Lloyd's, and had given him the freedom of the city of Dublin. Captain Everard was, in 1809, with the 2nd battalion of the 14th, in the expedition to Walcheren, and was at the siege of Flushing, when the two Bank companies of the 14th, one of which he commanded, stormed and carried a Dutch intrenchment, capturing one gun and thirteen prisoners, and establishing a lodgment within musket-shot of the walls of the town; the regiment, and the flank companies in particular, were publicly thanked. The same year of this achievement Everard was at the Battle of Corunna. He, in 1817, commanded the 14th Regiment at the siege and capture of Hatras. He was also in the Pindarrie and Mahratta wars in 1817 and 1818. He became a Major in 1821. In 1826 he commanded the 14th Regiment at the siege and storming of Bhurtpore. His effective valour there was strongly lauded in Lord Combermere's despatch; and he was particularly mentioned in the divisional orders of Major-General Sir T. Reynell. For his conduct at Bhurtpore, Everard was promoted to the rank of Lieut.-Colonel on the 19th January, 1826, and he was created a C.B. He became a K.H. in 1831; was made Colonel on the 23rd Nov., 1841; and Major-General on the 11th June, 1851. He had a second conferment of honours in 1854, when he was appointed a K.C.B., and £200 a year as a reward for distinguished services. Major-General Everard, who in private life was remarkable for his benevolent disposition and his munificent charities, is succeeded in his large estates in Ireland by his brother, the Rev. George Everard, of Ramalstown, in the county Meath.

LADY ASHBURTON.

THE RIGHT HON. HARRIET MARY, LADY ASHBURTON, died at Paris on the 4th instant. Her Ladyship was the elder daughter of George John, sixth Earl of Sandwich, by his wife Louisa, daughter of Armar, first Earl of Belmore; and was married the 12th April, 1823, to the Right Hon. William Bingham Baring, second Baron Ashburton. Her Ladyship had but one child, a son who died when an infant. Lady Ashburton has for the last thirty years, enjoyed a prominent position in the fashionable society of London. The hospitality of Lord and Lady Ashburton, at their residences, Bath House and the Grange, has long been proverbial; and Lady Ashburton was ever admired for her brilliant wit, singular good sense, solid information, and for her high spirit of restitude and benevolent disposition. The memory of her talents, and her many private virtues will not soon pass away.

ADMIRAL LORD WILLIAM FITZROY, K.C.B.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD WILLIAM FITZROY, Admiral of the White, and a Knight Commander of the Bath, was the third son of Augustus Henry, third Duke of Grafton, by his second wife, Elizabeth, second daughter of the Rev. Sir Richard Wrottesley, Bart. He was born the 1st June, 1782, and married, in 1816, Georgiana, second daughter of Thomas Raikes, Esq., by whom (who survives him) he leaves a son and two daughters. Admiral Lord William Fitzroy entered the Royal Navy in 1795. He commanded the Æolus frigate in Sir Richard Strachan's action in 1805, and at the reduction of Martinique. He was, in 1809, appointed to the Macedonia frigate on the Lisbon station. In 1811 his Lordship had to undergo much annoyance, and to be subject to temporary blame. He was, on a charge of having put the Master of his vessel in irons, dismissed the service. This man, however, was subsequently tried for contempt of his Lordship, and found guilty: he was expelled the Navy, and rendered incapable of serving again. The August of the same year saw Lord William restored to his rank. He became Admiral of the White in 1853. His Lordship died at East Sheen, on the 13th inst. His only son, Francis Horatio Fitzroy, born in 1826, married, in 1849, Gertrude, second daughter of Lord Feversham, and has a family.

J. DIXON, ESQ.

JOHN DIXON, Esq., who died at his seat, Knells, near Carlisle, on the 7th inst., was a magistrate of Cumberland, and was High Sheriff of that county in 1838. He was twice Mayor of Carlisle, and was elected M.P. for the same city in 1847. His remains were followed to the grave by the Corporation of Carlisle and by five or six thousand of the inhabitants—all the shops being closed on the occasion. Mr. Dixon was the head of one of the largest manufacturing establishments in the kingdom, which employs about five thousand people in the spinning, dyeing, and weaving of cotton. Mr. Dixon, who was born the 26th October, 1785, married, the 22nd November, 1814, Mary Tirzah, daughter of Captain Stordy, of the 31st Regiment, by whom he leaves three sons and four daughters: two of the latter are married, viz., Mrs. Charles William Thompson, and Mrs. James Robert Grant.

Her Majesty's yacht is under pressing orders to be got ready for sea, as the Queen will shortly make several marine excursions.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

THE present Prime Minister has been so long a director of diplomacy that his secretiveness extends to every one of his acts. No one was in the least aware when he appeared at the bar of the House of Commons on Monday last that he was about to do more than hand in some Parliamentary paper, as is the manner of Government officials; and even when he said that he had a Message from her Majesty it was supposed that it related to anything rather than the announcement of the marriage of the Princess Royal. This, it seems, was the subject on which a Privy Council had met on the previous Saturday; and, with regard to which that mysterious and mythical institution, the Court newsman, had been unusually reserved. Of course members took off their hats and sat in decorous attitudes to listen to the very insinuating address which conveyed to them that the moment was come which was to test one of the pledges at the hustings that was more eagerly demanded of them than any other. They had to consider the question of dowering the eldest daughter of the Queen, herself a Queen "in posse." The silence at the end of the Message was awful. As to a cheer, if any member had a notion in his mind that it would be becoming to employ that chartered ebullition of sympathy with a matter before the House, the half-born ejaculation stuck in his throat; and every man seemed to wish to ask his neighbour, "Look I as pale, Sir, as the rest?" It was the refinement of cruelty in Lord Palmerston to generalise the matter so decidedly as he did, and to keep members in suspense until Friday as to the sum which they were to be called on to vote.

There have been great Houses at the Parliamentary performances of the last few days. The Lords have actually assembled in something like numbers: and the Lord Chancellor has had the merit of bringing together a much larger collection of the episcopacy than was brought together even on the occasion of the vote on the justice and necessity of the Chinese war. In truth, one evening the right reverend benches, as they are oddly enough called, were so full that the Bishop of Oxford could not find a place except on the very back row, which is by no means the fitting position of so distinguished an ornament, physically and mentally, of the prelacy. The prevalence of new memberdom in the Commons is apparent in the packed appearance of the House for the greater part of every evening, and in the numbers which figure in the divisions. To do the new members justice, they are fast getting into the ways of the place, and except a tendency to doubt the propriety of wearing their hats, which is apparent in the unusual number of bare heads which a glance at the House, when in full conclave, will discover, they are becoming undistinguishable, and, generally speaking, are acquiring the air peculiar to the units of our collective Legislative wisdom. Let it be also said that there are already symptoms of the development of individual boredom, which is one of the characteristics of the House at all times. The last election cleared off several of the most special of the class who possess that accomplishment; but there is little doubt that the vacancies their elimination by their constituencies created will be soon filled up. Indeed, there is one honourable gentleman who promises great things in that line; and who seems to have taken Mr. Chisholm Anstey for his model; holding out hopes that he will speak on every debate, more for every possible sort of return, and keep every debate, more for every possible sort of return, and keep the House dividing at all sorts of terrible hours in the morning. A better test of the readiness of adaptation of the neophytes to the customs, tastes, and habits of the House could not be given than the fact that on the night when the Oaths Bill was introduced, they rose en masse and rushed to the door when Mr. Newdegate began to speak. Now if this was not instinct, or intuition, it showed considerable powers of perception and a due appreciation of the fitness of things very creditable to a new Parliament. The bill in question brought back the absent chiefs Lord John Russell was in his place, and Mr. Gladstone reappeared; but took no part in the matter in hand except to yawn very decidedly when Lord John was making his, on the whole, pointed and telling little speech: the main hits in which were a little too severe on the rather Asiatic personal appearance of Sir F. Thesiger, who leads the crusade against the de-christianising principle of the bill which the Government have separated from their grand coming measure of Reform. To be sure, Sir Frederick did tempt a retort, from the very significant manner in which he hinted that the Prime Minister may at some time or the other have known what it was to feel pressure from members of the Jewish persuasion; which, after all, was rather a playing with edged tools on the part of the hon. and learned member.

Then, again, a spirit of aptitude and disposability was displayed by the new House in running away from that part of the discussion on Ministers' Money which lingered weakly with Mr. Napier, and rumbled like muffled thunder with Mr. Whitside, and which exemplified the enforced resignation to his fate of an ex-Minister in the speech of Mr. Horsman who, sitting no longer on the Treasury bench, revelled in the notion that his last act as Irish Secretary, was a Parthian dart shot true into the very centre of his political enemies. There was a most admired docility in the manner in which the supporters of the Government answered to the whip of the Secretary to the Treasury, and came in crowds to hear the curt, crisp speech of the Premier, which wound up the debate; and in which he did not condescend to argue, but pointed to the ready host behind him, and flung his sic volo sic jubeo into the face of the Opposition, waiting to be discomfited.

Every one knows that there are two phases in the inner life of the House of Commons—two sorts of requirements which bring out two sorts of men, as a general rule—only a few showing capability for adaptation to both. Debating the principles of bills is one thing—dealing practically with their details in Committee is another. The time is yet young to expect any development of new membership in the first named department of their vocation; but the Committees on the Transportation Bill, and on the Naval Estimates, have shown that there is every likelihood of the novices turning out in many cases quite up to their work. The short, easy, conversational style of speaking in Committee is good practice for the Parliamentary aspirant; especially as he is not so alarmed at the aspect of the Chairman of Committees, sitting at the table with a natural head of hair and a more or less well-made frock-coat, as he is at the awful presence of the Speaker, canopied, enthroned, and uttering his oracular dicta from the depths of a full-bottomed wig; besides which the mace is out of sight, under the table, and the Serjeant-at-Arms generally asleep while the House is in Committee. Some of the notices of motion, too, which have been given by new members are not without indications of there being something in them. On the whole, though somewhat early to indulge in vaticination, one is inclined to think that the new House of Commons will not fail in comparison with its predecessors as a legislative assembly although, perhaps, that is not the most tremendous praise in the world.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

ST. JAMES'S PARK.—On the motion of Sir F. BARING, a return was ordered specifying the sums already expended upon the improvements in St. James's Park, together with an estimate of the further outlay necessary to complete the proposed works, of the Parliamentary vote sanctioning this expenditure, and of any correspondence that may have passed between the Treasury and the Board of Works on the subject.

The Registration of Leases (Scotland) Bill was read a second time, on the motion of Mr DUNLOP.

The Industrial Schools Bill was committed pro formâ, after some conversation, for the purpose of incorporating some amendments, and ordered to be reprinted.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION BILL.—The discussion in Committee on this bill was opposed by Mr. BLAND, on the ground that many Irish members were unavoidably absent. He moved that the Chairman should at once report progress; but on a division the House agreed to go on with the bill by a majority of 187 to 30—157. The successive clauses of the measure were then moved, its opponents challenging a division, after debate, upon each, but being always defeated by large majorities. So much time was, however, consumed in this process, that while clause 7 was under discussion the clock pointed at a quarter to six, and further progress was necessarily suspended.

The Rural Ales Amendment Bill was read a second time.

Leave was given to Mr. T. DUNCOMBE to bring in a bill to facilitate registration for the elective franchise in England and Wales.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

This being Ascension Day, their Lordships did not meet.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Lord Elphinston and three other members took their oaths and their seats.

EDUCATION IN SCOTLAND.—The LORD ADVOCATE, in reply to Viscount Melgund, said that want of time would prevent him from introducing in the present Session a measure of National Education in Scotland; but he hoped he should be able to do so in the next Session of Parliament.

THE WAR IN CHINA.—Sir C. WOOD, in reply to Major Wortley, said steps had been taken to keep as many of the troops in China on board ship as possible, with a view to the preservation of their health.

ELECTION PETITIONS. Petitions were presented against the returns at the late elections for the following places:—viz., Maldon, Lanark (county), Weymouth, Bridport, Ipswich (two petitions), Saltash, Bargh, Clare, Dreghiech, Sligo, Huntingdon (county) two petitions; Honiton, and Athlone. The petitions were ordered to be referred to the Committee on General Elections.

SHIPPING DUES AT DUBLIN.

Mr. VANCE asked for a Committee of the whole House, with the view of moving for leave to bring in a bill to repeal certain duties on ships entering the port of Dublin, and other imposts affecting its trade and commerce.

Mr LOWE said the circumstances under which the dues were levied in Dublin were so peculiar that the Government felt it their duty to resist the introduction of the proposed measure. They amounted to about £3000 a year, which was appropriated to the purposes of the Consolidated Fund in return for an expenditure of £25,000 on the part of the Government for the construction of Kingstown pier and harbour. In addition to this, the Government paid £2500 a year to the bailast commissioners there as compensation. To leave, then, the payment of this sum incumbent upon the Government, while depriving them of the £3000 a year dues, would be a great act of injustice.

Mr GREGAN charged the right hon. gentleman with having given an unfair history of the case; and entered into a statement with the view of showing how injurious these dues were to the trade of Dublin, and that the right hon. gentleman was acting in respect to Dublin most inconsistently with those general principles regarding shipping dues which he had before enunciated.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER concurred in the views expressed by his right hon colleague on this subject, and said that such a bill as was proposed would amount to a repudiation of an honest debt.

Mr. F. FRENCH and Lord CLAUDE HAMILTON supported the motion of the hon. member for Dublin.

Lord PALMERSTON said that the Government would have no objection to take the matter into their consideration when they were introducing a general measure on the subject (Laughter).

Mr DISRAELI expressed his surprise at the course which the Government took on this subject; and, without entering into the merits of the proposed measure, he hoped that they would not refuse the hon. member for Dublin the usual courtesy of permitting him to introduce his bill.

The House having divided, the motion was negatived by a majority of 253 against 133.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

Mr. SPOONER then brought forward his motion, "That this House do resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Act for the Endowment of Maynooth, with a view to the withdrawal of any endowment out of the Consolidated Fund, due regard being had to vested rights and interests. The hon. member disclaimed any wish or intention to interfere with the religious principles of any sect or denomination, and said that nothing but an imperative sense of duty would have induced him to undertake the present task. He knew that he was pursuing a course that was very disagreeable to a large portion of the House, including a number of those gentlemen with whom he generally acted, and for whom he entertained the highest respect (Hear, hear); but it was his conscientious conviction that this Protestant state was guilty of a grievous sin in contributing to support a religion which it declared by a solemn oath to be damnable and idolatrous. Having recapitulated his usual arguments, the hon. gentleman concluded by making his motion.

Mr BAYNHAM seconded the motion.

A short conversation then took place, which was confined to the following members—Mr. Hatfield, Mr. Gilpin, General Thompson, and Mr. Scholefield.

A division immediately followed, when the numbers were—For Mr. Spooner's motion, 91; against, 125: majority against Mr Spooner, 34.

FRAUDULENT BREACHES OF TRUST.

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL moved for leave to bring in a bill to make fraudulent breaches of trust criminally liable. He explained the difficulties by which the case was encompassed, and which, he warned the House, would require its most serious consideration in order to legislate safely on the subject. The hon. and learned gentleman in the course of his speech stated he was resolved without loss of time to institute a prosecution in the case of the Royal British Bank, and to ascertain if the law in its present state was not strong enough to deal with the guilty parties in that case.

Mr MALINS expressed his gratification that the hon. and learned gentleman had resolved to deal with this very important subject.

In reply to Mr. Napier, the ATTORNEY-GENERAL said he proposed that the bill should extend to Ireland.

Leave was then given to bring in the bill.

WINDING UP OF JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.

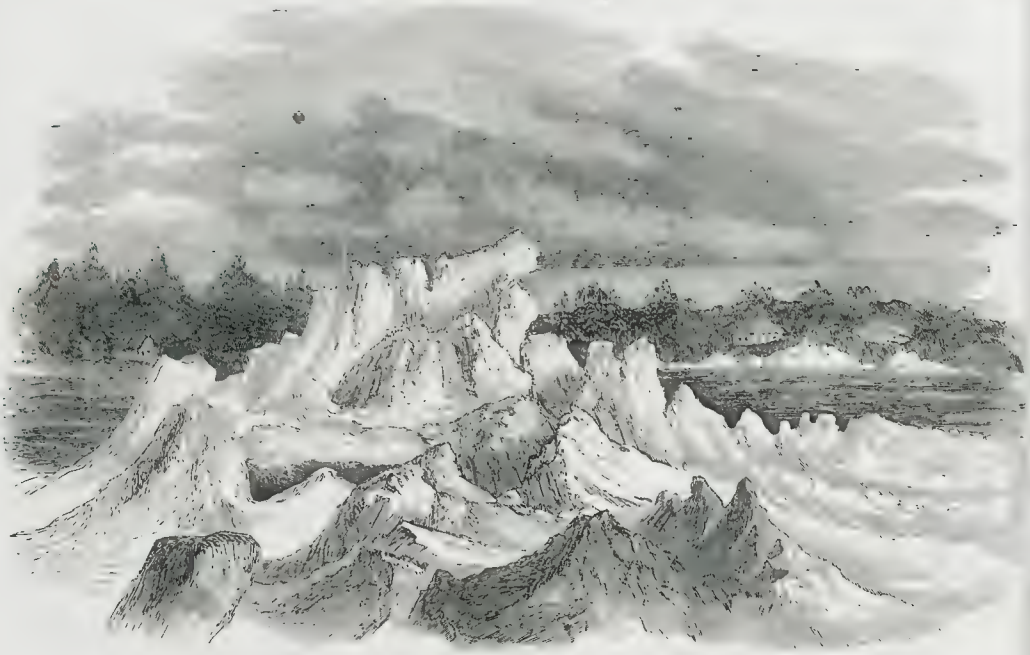
The ATTORNEY-GENERAL then moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the Act 7 and 8 Vict., facilitating the winding up of the affairs of unsuccessful joint-stock Companies unable to meet their pecuniary engagements; and also the Joint-stock Companies Winding-up Acts of 1848 and 1849. The object of the bill was to provide a remedy for such cases as that of the British Bank, when the state of the law which allowed a multiplicity of actions against individual shareholders had led to the bankruptcy of a large number, to the flight of another large portion, and to the conveyance of their property to friends on the part of others without any corresponding benefit to the creditors. To effect this he proposed that the creditors of an insolvent company should be called together by advertisement, and that they should then appoint certain persons to represent them, who should have the power to accept compromises, and the Court should have power to protect the shareholders who might give security that they will pay their share of any arrangement that may have been come to with the representatives of the creditors.

After a brief conversation, leave was given to bring in the bill.

ELECTION PETITIONS.—On Monday last petitions were presented complaining of the elections for Oxford, Athlone, Tewkesbury, Sligo, Lanark, Totnes, and Bury. At the previous sitting in the early part of the day three new petitions were issued. Two electors of Maidstone presented a petition against the return for that borough of Mr. Barnard Hope and Captain Scott. The petitioners allege bribery, treating, and intimidation against the sitting members. Two electors of Sunderland petitioned against the return of Mr. George Hudson, on the ground of want of property qualification. Mr. George Montagu Warren Peacocke, the defeated candidate at Maldon, has petitioned against the return of Mr. Thomas Sutton Western, on the ground of bribery, treating, and corruption. The recognisances of the petition of Colonel G. Gore Ouseley Higgins against the return of Mr. Moore for Mayo have been reported as unobjectionable, and that petition will consequently be the first tried.

Mdlle. Rachel has arrived at Marseilles from Egypt in improved health. The famous tragedienne goes to Cannes.



ICE HEAP FORMED NEAR THE OFFICERS BARRACKS, AT FREDERICTON.

BREAKING UP OF THE ICE IN THE ST. JOHN RIVER, FREDERICTON.

The past winter and the breaking up of the ice in the rivers in the British North American colony of New Brunswick, have been attended with circumstances of unusual interest—the most striking of which an obliging Correspondent at Fredericton has enabled us to present to our readers in the accompanying Illustrations. The climate rather resembles that of the countries along the southern shores of the Baltic than that of England. At the end of December or beginning of January the frost, which frequently is felt before, but only at intervals, becomes continual, and lasts to the end of March or the middle of April. The rivers generally break up about that time, so that the winter may be considered to last four months.

The breaking of the ice is always a circumstance of much interest: its appearance and general effect attract the attention of the lover of nature; the barrier of the long and rigorous winter is removed, and the navigation is opened for the plying of the small boats which are employed in the merchant service, affording greater facility for the communication with the port of St. John, and conveyance of goods to Woodstock and the Grand Falls, a distance of upwards of 130 miles from the city of Fredericton.

This year the winter has been of unusual severity. After six months' duration of extreme cold, when the thermometer varied from 10 to 33 deg. below zero, a greater degree of anxiety prevailed among the inhabitants, as from the quantity of snow in the woods and the solidity of the great body of ice in the river fears were entertained that a freshet would lay the town under contribution and swamp the buildings on the different landings—the low position of Fredericton rendering them subject to such disasters at each inundation.

About 11th April the ice gave notice, by moving on the shores (and by noises occasioned by the opening of fissures), that the work of dissolution was in progress. The course having been interrupted by what is termed a "jam," the water rose several feet along the roads. The sleigh roads, marked by trees planted in the ice, to the opposite shore were passable with safety even after the margin of the river had given way, and the country people were enabled to cross until the moment the general mass had moved downwards. The first indication of damage was the destruction of a storehouse at the steam-boat wharf, and ploughing of the banks in its immediate neighbourhood. The entire destruction of the York Hotel was looked for as inevitable. The building was immediately vacated—being blockaded on the river side by blocks of ice.

On the night of the 13th the inhabitants of Fredericton were startled by the cry of fire, and the roaring noise occasioned by the great rush of ice which was driven with force by the current, and which in its passage threatened the destruction of every opposing obstacle. In the confusion, din, and the darkness of the night it was difficult to foresee result. The alarm of fire proved to be occasioned by the overthrow two-storied dwelling-house at the upper end of the town. The riven with irresistible violence, broke into the basement story, completely away the lower story, and moved the whole house; ing a pile of ruins and heaps of ice-slabs, varying from four to ty feet piled up to some extent, and giving the idea as seen in Plant's Causeway, and forming the most beautiful natural masonry enable—the removal of which, to recover the property buried in uins, required the utmost exertion to even partially clear away. suddenness of the submersion of the basement and lower stories ely gave the families in the building time to escape with life. the first of the Illustrations is shown a vast heap of the blocks of riven into this form by the force of the flood In the next scene front of a house destroyed by the ice, by which the two lower s have been entirely carried away. In the third Engraving is the scene of destruction fronting the York Hotel, when the storehouse was carried away and the gas-lamp torn down. The fourth shows the rear of the house at the upper end of the town.

THE COMET.—The continuance of the cold weather (says the New York Courier) suggests an extraordinary cause, and it is found in the approach of the comet. In St. Louis, where they have been much troubled by the dreariness of the season, special attention has been given to the movements of the celestial vagrant. Correspondents of the newspapers in that city—gentlemen, we are assured, deep in mathematical and astronomical lore—have narrowly watched the celestial vagrant, and have given the results of their observations to the public. One of them, "Vernatus," so long ago as Nov. 9th, 1856, noticed the coming of the unwelcome visitor, and, "by way of fortifying the minds of the people against fear," reminded them that it was only Halley's comet of 1763. This writer's views are not so luminous as the focus of the comet, but they are novel, and "important if true":—"The near approach of this planet in embryo will influence our planet, perhaps the entire solar system. It will be attracted by the sun, and then repelled by it; it will both attract and repel the planets of the solar system, and appear to create disorder, confusion. But have no fears. It can neither attract, nor be attracted, so as to come in contact with any of the heavenly bodies. The most it can do to any of the planets (ours not excepted) will be, to change the currents of their electrical envelopes. This will have a tendency to give us the warmest or coldest winter (should the comet appear soon) experienced since 1763. Should the earth's electricity be attracted or repelled to either pole, the temperate zones will enjoy an unusual degree of mildness: on the other hand, should the earth's electric sheen be gathered in folds nearing the equatorial regions, then indeed may we expect the most intense cold ever experienced in this climate. In either event the disturbance of the ocean of electricity in which the solar system floats will produce extraordinary results in atmospheric temperature, wind currents and vegetation, until the electric equilibrium shall be re-established."

MANCHESTER—WHIT-MONDAY, JUNE 1, 2, 3, and 4.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 23, 1857.

An official notification in the Berliner Staats Anzeiger, followed by statements in both Houses of the British Parliament, has made known during the week the betrothal of the Princess Royal of Great Britain, and, in right of her father, Duchess of Saxony, to his Royal Highness the Prince Frederick William, nephew of the present King of Prussia, and son of the heir apparent to the Prussian throne. The event will excite in the minds of the people of Great Britain the same affectionate loyalty which was expressed with such graceful unanimity by all parties in the British Legislature, and has already been hailed by the Protestant people of Prussia with a satisfaction closely bordering upon enthusiasm. At the time at which we write no notification has been made of the amount of provision which Parliament will be called upon to make for the Princess in this important crisis of her life; but, whatever differences of opinion may be called into existence on this point, the generous British people, heavily taxed as they are, will cordially approve of a liberal allowance. The degree of liberality will be a subject for discussion; but the people recognise so fully in her Majesty the possession of the economic and household virtues, and are so grateful for the noble example which she has set in all the relations of life, that they will be far more inclined to be liberal than to be niggardly on such an occasion. The question, however, is one which concerns Prussia as well as Great Britain; and the heir to that flourishing monarchy will, probably, find it as consistent with his public dignity as with his personal feelings to depreciate any allowance which would seem to make him appear, in the eyes of his own people as well as in those of the country men and country-women of his future Queen, to be a pensioner upon the bounty of a foreign country. The numerous progeny with which Heaven has blessed the Queen of England affords so many securities for the lineal transmission of the British Crown in the male line that it may perhaps appear ungracious to hint that, when British Princesses marry the heirs to Continental thrones, it would be politic to exclude them and their children from the chances, which might otherwise be theirs, of succession to the British Crown. Yet we scarcely think such exclusion unnecessary. If the direct male descendants of her Majesty should fail, and the right of succession should descend to the female line, it would be unfortunate, and might lead to many troubles, if the heir to the British Crown should happen to be at the same time King of Prussia or Emperor of Austria or Russia. The proud kingdom of England could not tolerate the idea of being an appanage to any of the powerful monarchies of the Continent; and it should be the business of a wise Legislature to guard against such a danger, however remote it may appear. By a policy which many sensible and loyal people think to be unwise, if not unnatural, the Princesses of England are forbidden to marry among their own countrymen. The danger guarded against in this case is that of raising up aristocratic families too nearly related to the Crown to perform the duties of ordinary citizens; but the danger, remote, though possible, resulting from alliances with the Sovereigns of Europe ought to be guarded against with as much, or even greater, care. The time has come when the marriages of her Majesty's daughters, following in due course, the one after the other, will force this subject upon the attention of Parliament and the public; and there can be no time more propitious for its dispassionate consideration than a time when the male succession is apparently well secured in the person of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and of three other Princes. This question is, in fact, a far more important one than that of dowry or allowance on which so many of the public journals have permitted themselves to indulge in extravagant and unwarranted speculations, but, as it does not so immediately touch the feelings—or rather the pockets—of the people, has been almost, if not altogether, lost sight of, except by the few advanced minds who have studied history. The satisfaction of the British people at the severance of their political and dynastic connection with Hanover was great and well founded. That connection led the nation into many difficulties, dangers, and expenses, from the effects of which it is still suffering. If true wisdom consists in being warned by the experience of the past, true wisdom should dictate to the Legislature at the present time the necessity of avoiding the recurrence of similar entanglements; which, in such a case as that of Prussia, or any other leading State of Europe, would be far worse than with a small State like Hanover. For considerably up wards of a century the question has not arisen; but, having arisen in 1857, it must be fairly met and duly considered.

MR. DISRAELI has favoured a portion of the electors of South Buckinghamshire with an eloquent exposition of his opinions on things in general. Before proceeding into Buckinghamshire on this errand, Mr. Disraeli had a short interview, at two o'clock in the morning, with a "very great personage" unnamed—doubtless Lord Derby—who somewhat irreverently expressed to Mr. Disraeli his surprise at what he could possibly have to say to the farmers of Newport Pagnell. Though fresh from the presence of the "great personage," Mr. Disraeli, nevertheless, felt that he, the Commoner, was greater than the Peer who had received "all that the favour of the Sovereign and the confidence of the people could bestow upon him in his distinguished career," but had never received the greater honour of representing Bucks. With a due sense of the superior dignity derivable from this circumstance, Mr. Disraeli, thus standing as it were on the summit of earthly glory, favoured his admiring listeners with a discourse embracing the important subjects of agricultural prosperity, the influx of Californian and Australian gold, Parliamentary reform, the British Constitution, the Established Church, and the state of parties in the new House of Commons. It was, however, only on the subject of Parliamentary reform that Mr. Disraeli said anything very pertinent. The public will learn that Mr. Disraeli, contrary to expectation, has not prepared a Parliamentary Reform Bill of his own. Although he has evidently studied the subject, and is resigned to the unpleasant necessity of seeing it discussed, Mr. Disraeli thinks it remarkable—and wrong—that, at a time when the great body of the people is prosperous and satisfied, the country should hear of great impending innovations in our political institutions. We, in common with the public, have heard of impending changes; but we have not heard on any authority that these changes are, as Mr. Disraeli states, to be "great." Certainly neither Lord Palmerston nor Lord John Russell, who are the only great leaders of the Reform party that we know of, now that Mr. Disraeli has renounced the title, has announced any innovations in our representative system, or the constitution of Parliament, that can be called "great." On the contrary, as Mr. Disraeli admits, in a later portion of his speech, the Prime Minister has merely announced his intention to bring in a Parliamentary Reform Bill next year, "leaving it to public opinion in the interval to give a tone as to what the character of the measure may be." If the changes are to be great the public must demand them; and what they demand they will doubtless obtain. We very much question, however, if public opinion will go the length to which Mr. Disraeli would lead it. While deprecating change, he insists upon changes, if any are to be made at all, which are far wilder and more extravagant than any which Lord Palmerston or Lord John Russell would think of advocating. Mr. Disraeli finds on a careful, and, we have no doubt, a fair and accurate, study of the electoral statistics of England and Wales, that the counties only return one member to Parliament for every 67,883 inhabitants, while the boroughs return one member for every 22,384 inhabitants. He would, it appears, reform this inequality, either by increasing the county representation about threefold, leaving the borough representation as it stands; or, he would leave the county representation as it is, and diminish the number of borough members by two-thirds. But while Mr. Disraeli would thus increase the influence of what he persists in calling the landed interest—as if, after the establishment and complete success of Free-trade, there could be any difference of interest between town and country, or between manufactures and agriculture—he would especially oppose the increase of the agricultural constituencies, as proposed by Mr. Locke King. "It is impossible," he says, "that any sane man can conceive the project to increase the county constituencies." In shorter parlance, Mr. Disraeli would give the existing constituencies for the rural districts threefold the political power which they at present possess, and would not permit any introduction of fresh blood among them, even from their own class. We imagine that a Reform Bill on Mr. Disraeli's basis would, if there were any chance of its being carried, or even seriously proposed, be as distasteful to the agricultural as to the urban and manufacturing population. The quarrel between Trade and Spade is at an end, and the promoters of the new Reform Bill will not, we may be certain, seek to revive it by invidious distinctions between borough and county, or between one form of productive industry which manufactures food, and another form which manufactures cloth or iron. Though there are many rotten boroughs, Whig as well as Tory, which might well be disfranchised, with a transference of their members to such counties as may, on Mr. Disraeli's showing, be inadequately represented under the present system, it is not so much the redistribution of the franchise as the extension of the suffrage which the country expects. The admission into the full rights of citizenship of many educated, industrious, and exemplary persons who are now excluded, is the first thing needful; and this modicum of Reform, as we gather from Mr. Disraeli's speech, is the very thing that he is not only unprepared to grant, but that which he would most strenuously oppose. Mr. Disraeli, however, deserves credit for having drawn public attention to the subject of Reform, and for having placed before the country his statistics and his arguments. Although he has been somewhat self-contradictory in deprecating change at one moment, and suggesting very wild changes at another, it is desirable that men in his eminent position should from time to time stir up the public mind to discussions on the true principles of the new Reform Act which has become inevitable. It is far better that these principles should be discussed before the country has been goaded, as it was the last time, to the very brink of a Revolution. It is just because the people are prosperous and contented at the present time that the present time is particularly opportune for the consideration not only of the borough and county franchise, but of all the other questions inseparable from Parliamentary Reform;—such as the extension of the franchise, the protection of the Ballot, and the expediency of shortening the duration of Parliaments. Mr. Disraeli's speech is a challenge to the Liberal party. It is none the worse, but much the better, for being a good-humoured one, and will certainly be taken up by many competent and earnest gladiators. It is like the Irishman's coat—which was purposely ira led through the fair by its owner that some one might tread upon it, and bring the wholesome shillelahs into play. Will Lord John Russell, or any other eminent Reformer, be good enough to put his foot upon it?

THE ROYAL VISIT TO MANCHESTER.—The Queen and Prince Albert on their approaching visit to the Art-Treasures Exhibition, arrive to be the guests of the Earl of Ellesmere, at Worsley Hall, near Manchester. The fact is, the noble Earl is in too weak a state of health to entertain the Queen at his patrimonial inheritance, but he has placed his princely seat entirely at the disposal of her Majesty during the Queen's visit to that part of the province. None of the Earl of Ellesmere's household will attend on the Royal party, in consequence of the lamented demise of the late Earl placing them in mourning; and all the duties during the visit of the Queen and suite, will be discharged by her Majesty's own servants. There is no truth in the rumour which has gained currency that the Queen and Prince Albert will visit the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland at Trentham, the ducal seat, in Staffordshire.

PLAIN SPEAKING.—The Earl of Orford, in reply to an application made to him by the secretary of the Norwich Bible Society, to take the chair at their meeting, writes as follows: "Sir,—I am surprised and annoyed at the contents of your letter—surprised because my well-known character should have exempted me from such an application, and annoyed, because it obliges me to have this communication with you. I have long been addicted to the gaming-table; I have taken to the turf; I fear I frequently blaspheme—have never distributed religious tracts. All this you well know, and to your society; notwithstanding which you think me a fit person for your president. God forgive your hypocrisy. I would rather live in the land of sinners than with such saints.—I am, sir, &c. (signed) OXFORD."—Dublin Freeman's Journal.

MR. MACDOUGALL OF THE ROYAL TARTAN WAREHOUSE.—We have great pleasure in calling public attention to a presentation of plate and a public dinner given to Mr. Macdougall, Inverness, by some of the leading merchants in Glasgow. Business was not always so prosperous at the Royal Tartan Warehouse as, we are glad to see, it has been of late; and in 1857, from a variety of unfavourable circumstances, Mr. Macdougall had to call his affairs in the hands of his creditors. His liabilities were large but the composition offered was accepted, and Mr. Macdougall received a full discharge of the balance, amounting to nearly £6000. This sum he has since voluntarily repaid—an act which he modestly refers to as simply one of duty; but such cases are unhappily so rare that it has led to the following testimonial, recorded in our two journals, by the merchant princes of Glasgow. The plate, presented by Sir James Campbell, is of the value of £350. After the purchase of the plate, a surplus of about £50 of the money subscribed remained, and this the committee very unanimously appropriated to the purchase of a good watch for Mr. Macdougall's two daughters. On the whole there has rarely been an incident in the commercial world which, in all its circumstances and accompaniments, has been so honourable to the parties concerned, and we cordially congratulate Mr Macdougall on the highly-gratifying result.—Inverness Courier.

NEW CHURCH.—On Tuesday was the new church at Drake's Broughton, near Pershore, re-opened with a plot of land to serve as a burial-ground. It was consecrated by the Bishop of Worcester. The style of the architecture of the edifice is the Early Decorated; the architect, Mr. W. J. Hopkins, of Worcester.

A STRIKE FOR HIGHER WAGES.—The stonemasons at Liverpool have adopted resolutions for an advance of wages from 27s. to 30s. per week, the shortening of the hours of labour one hour on Monday morning, and, it is said, four hours on Saturday besides the compulsory erection of sheds for the men to work in, to protect them from the inclemency of the weather. In addition to these resolutions the men adopted another, to the effect that they should require pay for the time occupied in walking to their work beyond the boundaries of the borough; but this was subsequently rescinded. A meeting of the masters was held on Saturday evening, when a deputation of the men attended. The masters wished to know whether the men would concede any point; but they resolutely refused to do so, and consequently, the men made up their minds to strike work. As this is the busy season for builders, the strike will seriously interfere with many branches of trade.

ANOTHER BANK DEFALCATION.—A good deal of excitement was caused on Saturday last in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and elsewhere, by the report that Mr. Henry Salmon, the agent for the Commercial Bank of Scotland at Falkirk, had absconded, after having made free to a large extent with the coffers of the bank. That such is the case is now not any longer a matter of doubt, and it is understood that Mr Salmon's defalcations extend to at least £50,000. The Commercial Bank, like all the other Scotch banking establishments, has a regular system of inspection of the most searching kind; but it would appear that Mr. Salmon had made free with the funds in a way which set ordinary means for detection at defiance. While drawing bills were signed or granted, a receipt in the name of the bank in the ordinary way, but applied the funds to his own use; and, as the transaction did not appear in the books of the bank, detection by the ordinary checks was impossible. He must, however, have retained a private memorandum of these unpaid receipts, so as to arrange for the payment of the interest upon them as it became regularly due. Up till this exposure Mr. Salmon was a man of high consideration in the district, took a prominent part in every public movement, and lived sumptuously. He was the oldest official connected with the Commercial Bank, having been connected with the establishment for the period of forty years. This event is likely to lead to a keen scrutiny into the condition of the branches of the Scottish banks generally, which, in the spirit of competition, have been planted far too thickly.

LUNDHILL COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—Since Saturday last only six more dead bodies have been recovered. Of these two were brought out on Monday, and one of them was identified as that of George Thompson, one of the leaders of the Oaks strike. One was found on Tuesday, and the other three on Wednesday, on the north side where the men are still busily engaged in clearing away the roof. An inspection of the pit was made on Tuesday by the engineers, for the purpose of laying before the jury, which was to meet on Thursday, the state of the pit up to that time, and if possible to give some idea of the cause of the terrible accident. The number of bodies recovered has now reached 101.

THE ROMANTIC ELOPEMENT.—The South-Eastern Gazette of Tuesday says that the reward of £100 offered for the discovery of the two young ladies who were restored to their friends by the authorities of Canterbury is ready to be paid, in accordance with the terms of the advertisement in the Times, the Baron Grucky de Steinturz having placed that sum in the hands of the agent, Mr. Dawson, of Pall-mall.

COMMITTAL OF BACON FOR MURDERING HIS MOTHER.—Thomas Bacon, who was tried last week for the murder of his children, has been committed for trial on the charge of having poisoned his mother with arsenic. Professor Taylor, who has analysed the contents of the stomach, &c., has found a considerable quantity of arsenic in them

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

ROYAL LITERARY FUND.—The anniversary of this society was held on Tuesday last, at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Earl Granville was announced as the chairman, but the noble Lord was detained by his duties in the House of Lords; and, in his absence, the Right Hon. W. Cowper, M.P., presided. About 200 gentlemen sat down to dinner. Among other toasts proposed, the Chairman gave "The Literature of the United Kingdom and Mr. Arthur Helps." Mr. Helps responded. Mr. Monckton Milnes, M.P., in an elaborate speech, proposed "The Literature of the Colonies and Mr. Justice Haliburton," who had left the turbid waves of the Atlantic to dwell on the pellucid waters of the Thames. Here, Mr. Justice Haliburton was unanimously cheered, and made an excellent speech. Mr. Thackeray proposed the toast of the evening, "Prosperity to the Royal Literary Fund." Whilst the Bishops and the Earls were pursuing their duties elsewhere, and were taking different sides of the question, he hoped they would show how harmonious they could be, by proposing the toast with nine times nine, in the absence of the noble Lord. At spite of all their difficulties, on looking round the room he could see nothing but an immense chorus of prosperity. On his left there were those dark faces that had greeted him under the palms of India; to his right he saw an old friend whom he had never seen till that evening (Laughter), and Colonel Hamley, who had written of the thunders of Alma, Balaclava, and Inkerman, and had written novels like one of themselves. Everything looked well for the prosperity of the society. Each of the gentlemen he would shake hands with as with old friends. If they could only have heard the speech he had prepared for another toast to which his name had been attached, they would have revelled in a luxury of eloquence such as at present they could not expect (Laughter). He heartily wished prosperity to the Royal Literary Fund. The list of subscriptions included donations of the twentieth annual donation of her Majesty £105; James Messenger, Esq., of Croydon, by bequest, £175; the Earl of Ellenborough, thirty-first annual donation, 16 guineas; the Archbishop of Dublin, eighth donation, £10 10s.; the Stationers' Company, thirty-second annual donation, £20; Mr. Thackeray, sixth donation, 16 guineas; Bishop of Lincoln, 10 guineas; Colonel Sykes, 10 guineas; Hon. Mr. Justice Haliburton, 5 guineas, and 5 guineas annually; General Sir W. Williams of Kars, Bart., M.P., 3 guineas; Benj. Bond Cabbell, Esq., twenty-sixth donation, 10 guineas; Baron Rothschild, ninth donation, £10; John O'Coog, £2; Sir E. Murchison, sixth donation, 10 guineas, &c. The total amount received at the close of the evening was upwards of £1200.

PEACE SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of this society was held on Tuesday evening in Finsbury Chapel Mr. Charles Hindley, M.P., in the chair. The abstract of the report read by the Rev. Henry Richards, the secretary, commenced by regretting that after the conclusion of the war with Russia there should have been hostilities with Persia and China, and fears of outbreaks in Italy and America. Lectures have been given and public meetings held during the past year for the benefit of the society in London and its suburbs, and in most of the principal towns in England, Wales, and Scotland. Upwards of 600,000 publications, advocating peace principles, had been put in circulation during the past year; and pamphlets, circulars, bills, and placards, showing the horrors of war and the blessings of peace, had also been circulated during the recent election in the different shires and boroughs by a separate organisation, formed for electoral purposes, for which funds had been expressly raised. The present position of the peace cause was a source of sorrow and regret to the committee, it being believed by them that a warlike and unchristian spirit was abroad; but at the same time it was believed that the cause must finally triumph, and wars cease from one end of the world to the other. The official account showed the total income for the past year to have been £1838 18s., and the total expenditure £1210 16s. 1d.; leaving a balance in favour of the society of £317 2s. 11d.

THE BROMPTON CONSUMPTION HOSPITAL.—The anniversary dinner of this institution was given on Wednesday evening, at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, Lord Stanley, M.P., in the chair. The usual loyal and patriotic toasts having been given and duly honoured, the chairman gave the toast of the evening, "Prosperity to the Brompton Hospital." In proposing this toast the noble Lord stated that 4,5,6,0 deaths would occurred yearly in the metropolitan districts, 5600 were caused by consumption; thus, excluding infantine mortality, about one-fifth of the deaths arose from this disease. Since the establishment of this hospital it had relieved 6586 in-patients and 36,630 out-patients. Its income had in one year amounted to £19,000; but had averaged between £7000 and £8000. If the hospital were well managed, it was certainly deserving of the support of the public; and that it was well managed these and other facts stated in the report would undoubtedly prove. During the evening subscriptions were announced amounting to upwards of £1000, of which the noble chairman gave twenty guineas, and the Earl of Derby thirty guineas.

BANK-DAY PARISH BOUNS.—Thursday being Ascension-day, or Holy Thursday, the Incumbents of the metropolitan parishes, the churchwardens, and other officials, assisted by the charity-boys, who, in most cases, were the most attractive portions of the procession, in consequence of the crest with which they performed their annual beating of the bounds, regarded against the intrusion of the "profane" who would north of them the legal gentlemen have hitherto successfully resisted the Bishop of St. Dunstan's, with his faithful band of clergy and boys, forced open "the outer gates of the Temple" and requested admission, but the guards kept to their posts, and the legal citadel was impregnable. The Bishop and his retinue (as they had done many years) were entertained during an entrance, and the Templars consequently still maintain the exemption from parochial rates. The same ceremony was gone through with probably the same results at Lincoln's-inn and Gray's-inn.

CONVOCATION.—On Wednesday morning there was a formal meeting of the convocation of the province of Canterbury at Westminster. An adjournment was declared until the 10th of July.

PREVENTION OF CRIME.—On Wednesday afternoon, at St. Martin's Hall, Mr. Hodgskin delivered a lecture in which he undertook to answer the question, "What shall we do with our criminals!" The lecturer endeavoured to point out the means of preventing crime; his short answer to the above question being "Don't create them." A considerable portion of the lecture was occupied in citing instances of the force of example, and Mr. Hodgskin promised, on a subsequent occasion, to point out more in detail how this influence may be applied for the prevention of crime

POST OFFICE ACCOMMODATION.—The morning newspapers being now regarded even officially, as branches of the public service, a communication has been made to them from the Post-office, that in the evening despatches for them being contained in the Overland mails, which occasionally reach the Post-office in the evening, they will be delivered on application at the Post-office with the least possible delay, on condition that such despatches are addressed "to the Editors," and inclosed in a new envelope

TESTIMONIAL TO MR. JOHN MASTERMAN.—The subscription voluntarily entered into for a testimonial to Mr. Masterman, on his retirement from the representation of the city of London, already exceeds £1100, and will, it is expected, speedily reach £2000, as many leading commercial men have signified their intention to enrol their names on the subscription list. The form of testimonial has not yet been determined upon

AWKWARD MISTAKE.—"Don't come—Too late."—Such was the message lately consigned to the electric telegraph in London, for a famous accoucheur in Edinburgh. "Don't come too late" was the message delivered. Of posted the Doctor to the English metropolis—only to learn that the "little stranger" had received its "welcome some days before his arrival

EXTENSIVE FIRES.—On Wednesday morning, about five o'clock, a fire of a very alarming nature broke out in the extensive range of premises belonging to Mr. Thomas R. Denny, sail-cloth manufacturer, Dunbridge Distillery, at Battersea. The damage done is estimated at £20,000 Fortunately Mr. Denny was insured. Another fire occurred in a turpentine store and granary shop belonging to Mr. Martin, next door to St. John Knox's Church, in Northampton-place, Green-street, Stepney. By the time the engines arrived the place and all it contained were consumed, but no dwelling was done to the church.

DIABOLICAL OUTRAGE.—On Wednesday night, about half-past eleven o'clock, a packet containing gunpowder and other explosive matter was thrown down the area of Lindsay's Quadrant Hotel, Aldersgate Street, and its explosion broke all the windows in the basement. The servant boy, who was asleep at the time, within a few feet of the window, had a narrow escape No clue to the perpetrator of the outrage has been obtained.

PRETENDED SALE OF GOVERNMENT SITUATIONS.—At Clerkenwell Police Station, last Monday, James Calill, an Admiralty messenger, and his wife, were charged with obtaining £250, on false pretences, from a gentleman of the name of Alexander Duncan, in February last. The prisoners knew Mr. Duncan sent an advertisement to the Morning Post, offering from £200 to £300 for a good situation, "if it could be obtained legitimately." This led to a correspondence, and he ultimately received a note signed L. G., offering him a situation of £300 a year, with an increase of £50 yearly, on condition of his payment of £250. Mr. Duncan having received a letter written on official paper, sealed with the Admiralty seal, and purporting to be signed by Mr Phinn, appointing him to a second clerk-ship in the storekeeper's department, immediately sent off Cox's bank notes to the parties who had been so kind. In February he received a letter telling him to call at 9, Gloucester-terrace, Regent's park; but, on proceeding there, he found that he had been duped, and that the house was occupied by the Earl of Hopetoun. The prisoners were remanded for further examination.

THE TOLL-REFORM MOVEMENT.—DEPUTATION TO LORD PALMERSTON.—On Wednesday afternoon a deputation, consisting of Lord Robert Grosvenor, M.P., Mr. Herbert Ingram, M.P., Mr. Watkin, M.P., Mr. P. H. Le Breton, barrister-at-law, Mr. J. Dangerfield, Mr. Rixon, Mr. Slater, Mr. Francis Toulmin, Mr. G. Harding, Mr. A. Lanes, Mr. R. Margetson, and other gentlemen, waited upon Lord Palmerston, at Cambridge-house, for the purpose of urging upon him the adoption by the Government of a measure for the removal of all toll-gates within a radius of six miles of Charing-cross. Lord R. Grosvenor having introduced the deputation, Mr. J. E. Bradfield laid before Lord Palmerston a map in which all the toll gates near the metropolis were distinctly marked. Lord Palmerston, after asking several questions which were replied to by Mr Bradfield, said that, if he understood the object of the deputation, it was to urge the appointment of a commission to obtain the abolition of all turnpike-gates within a certain distance of London, and to throw the repair of the roads upon the parishes in fact, to provide for the repair of the roads out of a local rate. Mr. H. Ingram, M.P., said the object of the deputation was to request the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government to take measures to rid the metropolitan roads of all toll bars and gates within six miles of Charing-cross. It was a fact which had been clearly proved that every neighbourhood in which a toll-bar was placed suffered a deep injury, and that the people had to pay more for their provisions and other necessaries than was the case in other districts where the turnpikes did not exist. In France, Sweden, Norway, and in America there were no toll-gates; and as they existed in England they were a disgrace to our civilisation. A commission was appointed for the purpose of obtaining a diminution of the gates, but the result of the labours of that commission had been that the number of gates had increased from 70 to 117 (Laughter). Lord Palmerston said he supposed that the increase was to be accounted for by the additional number of side-bars in expanding neighbourhoods. Mr. Bradfield informed his Lordship that the practice was to put up side-bars at a station where there, and these boys were paid according to the amount they collected. The boys got as much as they could from the people passing through, but more frequently they got nothing at all (Laughter). The expenses of 1832 and 1856 was against multiplication of bars, and it was provided that as soon as all debts were paid the gates should be removed. The debts had long since been paid off, and yet the gates were kept up. Lord Palmerston said the subject was doubtless one of great importance, and one on which he should not like to give a hasty opinion. He should feel obliged if the members of the deputation would transmit to him, as early as possible, a written statement of facts and arguments, and he would give it his best attention. At present he could not pledge her Majesty's Government to any decided course of action with reference to the matter. The deputation thanked his Lordship for their reception, and retired

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SAILORS' SOCIETY.—The twenty-fourth annual meeting of this benevolent institution was held at the London Tavern on Thursday Admiral Vernon Harcourt presided. From the report it appeared that the society was in the enjoyment of increasing prosperity. Through the medium of the pulpit £345 had been raised towards defraying the expense of the building fund; and during the past year a donation of 1000 francs had been received from the Emperor of the French, and £50 from Miss Nightingale. The report was adopted; and after proceedings, which were very interesting, terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' ASYLUM.—The anniversary of this very meritorious society was held on Wednesday at Highbury Barn, when there was a numerous attendance of the friends of the institution in the number exceeding 600 The gentlemen who supported the chairman, Mr. T. Bass, M.P., were Sir J. Duke, M.P., Mr. R. Hanbury, M.P., Mr. A. S. Ayrton, M.P., Mr. E. James, Q.C., &c. There are at present 142 inmates in the asylum, and during the period of twenty seven years the trade and their friends and connections have contributed upwards of £30,000 to provide an asylum for the reception and comfort of the less fortunate members of their particular calling. A report was read by Mr. Thomas Jones, the secretary, which in substance set forth the facts stated, and announced that the amount of the subscription during the evening was £3585.

CALEDONIAN BALL.—This grand annual festival has been arranged to take place on Friday, the 19th of June. The lady patronesses are now in town, and have already announced their meetings preliminarily to the 6th, which, as usual, will take place at Willis's Rooms.

HEALTH OF LONDON.—The total number of deaths registered in London in the week that ended on Saturday last was 1060; of which 514 were deaths of males, 546 those of females. In the ten years 1847-56 the average number of deaths in the same week corresponding with last week was 1046; but as the deaths of last week occurred in an increased population, it is necessary for comparison that the average should be raised in proportion to the increase, in which case it will become 1151. It appears that the number of persons who died last week was less by 100 than would have died if the average rate of mortality had prevailed. As a result which must be accepted as proof of a favourable condition of the public health. In the present returns are the deaths of six nonagenarians a man 90 years of age, a woman 92 years, a man 93 years, a man and a woman 94 years, and a woman who died in the Merchant Taylors' Almshouses at Lee at the age of 97 years. Last week the births of 853 boys and 803 girls—in all 1656 children, were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1623

The range of temperature during the week was 30°6 deg.

A heavy thunderstorm took place after 11h. p.m. of the 13th, which continued for upwards of an hour. The lightning was forked, and very vivid, and accompanied with heavy peals of thunder. Rain was falling at the same time. The sky has been partly clear during the week, with the exception of the days of the 16th and 18th, and the weather generally fine Mist appeared about the horizon on the mornings of the 18th, 19th, and 20th, and the sky became suddenly and densely overcast at 11h 15m. a.m. of the 20th, having been previously brilliantly clear. The wind was very changeable on the day of the 15th, and blowing rather freshly on the evening of the 20th. J. BRIEN.

Hourly values are obtained from the curves traced at the Observatory, 6h. and 18h. p.m., on each day, except Sunday, when the first observation is omitted. The corrections for diurnal variation are taken from the tables of Sir Gladstone. "Dew point" and "Relative Humidity" are obtained from observations of the dry and wet bulb thermometers by Dr. Apjohn's formula and Dalton's table. The Observatory is 4 miles W.S.W. of Hyde Park Corner. The movement of the wind is given by the record of Robinson's Anemometer the values stated for each day being that registered from midnight to midnight.

RESPONSIBILITY OF CAB PROPRIETORS IN FRANCE.—A case of appeal, involving the responsibility of masters in respect to their servants, and which has excited much interest here, was decided on Saturday. Some time ago a cab-driver, named Colignon, assassinated one of his fares. He was tried, condemned, and executed. The widow of the murdered man laid an action against the owner of the cab driven by the assassin, from whom she claimed damages to the extent of 50,000 fr. The Court condemned the owner to 10,000 fr damages, and his appeal against this sentence has been rejected, and the decision of the Court confirmed. Letter from Paris

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—A marriage is on the tapis between Captain the Hon. James A. Ponsonby, second son of the late and brother of the present, Lord De Mauley, and the Hon. Louisa Caroline, Maid of Honour to the Queen, second daughter of the late Lord Henry Gordon, and sister to Lady Augustus Fitzclarence, widow of the youngest son of the late King William IV. Colonel the Hon. Charles Cadogan is about to form a matrimonial alliance with Miss Ashworth, who has been one of the belles of aristocratic life during the past two seasons.—We understand that a marriage is arranged to take place between the Right Hon. Frederick Peel and the beautiful Miss Shelley, only daughter of John Shelley, Esq., of Avington, Hants, and niece of the poet, Percy Bysshe Shelley PRESENT FROM THE KING OF PORTUGAL TO THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND.—His Majesty the King of Portugal has just sent over to this country a present of cattle of a very peculiar breed to her Majesty Queen Victoria, consisting of a bull, two heifers, and a bull calf. The animals, which are of the most perfect symmetry, and very diminutive, standing scarcely forty inches high, are of a dun colour, and in fine condition. The cows are very docile, but the bull, on being driven from the station to Prince Albert's Model Farm, Frogmore, where they are now installed, exhibited a disposition rather the reverse of that of his companions, by tossing an unfortunate donkey, about his own size, which happened to come in his way. These lilliputian animals very much resemble the Alderney or Jersey breed, but appear to be scarcely more than half the size.

THE MANCHESTER ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION.

THE first shilling day was Monday, when, strange to say, the attendance was less than it had been on almost any day in the previous week. On Thursday and Saturday the numbers were considerably over 7000, and on Monday they were only a little over 4000; on Tuesday they increased to over 6000. The same was the case at the commencement of the shilling days on the Exhibition in 1851, and there is no doubt that by degrees the people of Lancashire, and of England generally, will begin to appreciate the intellectual banquet provided for their entertainment.

In connection with this subject, it may be mentioned that the Annual Exhibition of Modern Paintings and Works of Art at the Royal Manchester Institution was opened on Monday, when there was a very fair display, and a full attendance of visitors. In the evening a full dress conversazione was held; the magnificent rooms of the Institution being lighted up, and the effect of the pictures most splendid and cheerful. Amongst the most prominent exhibitors whose works attracted marked attention were E. Eagle, P. R. A., Marshall, W. Linton, C. J. Lewis, F. R. S., Raven, G. W. Horlor, Jo. Bough, Day, Jackson, F. D. Watson, and J. A. Hammersley. A considerable number of the pictures met with purchasers, at fair, liberal prices, on the first day.

Mr. Ottley commenced a series of lectures on the Fine Arts at the Royal Manchester Institution on Friday, when there was a very numerous audience, who evinced a lively interest in the subject

We have received a communication from Mr. Salomons, the architect, of Manchester, with respect to his share in the construction of the ART TREASURES Palace. Mr. Salomons states, that in addition to the façade of the building (as stated in our Journal of last week), he (from the suggestion of Mr. Deane) arranged the offices, entrances, transept, centre-colonge galleries, upper galleries, &c. The whole of the architectural details in iron, brick, and wood, the transept windows, and other parts too numerous to mention, were made after Mr. Salomons' drawings. The constructive portion of the building was under the superintendence of Mr. Bredge. It is scarcely possible to divide the work executed by each of these gentlemen, as nothing was done without the engineer and architect consulting together.

THE BETROTHAL OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL

THE announcement of the Betrothal of Prince Frederick William of Prussia with the Princess Royal of England was published in the Staats Anzeiger of Sunday last. A translation of the announcement may not be unwelcome to our readers:—

His Majesty the King having been pleased to-day to inform the Royal Family and the Council, which his sons approbation and the consent of her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the betrothal of his Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia with Princess Victoria Adelaide Mary Louisa, Princess Royal of Great Britain and Ireland, and Duchess of Saxony, has taken place.

A similar announcement has been made on the part of her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland to her Majesty's Privy Council.

This joyful event, so gratifying to the Royal house and to the entire monarchy, is hereby made public by command of his Majesty the King.

The High Chamberlain of his Majesty the King,
General Field Marshal Count BOINA.

Berlin, May 22, 1857.

In the midst of the [illegible] language (says the Berlin correspondent of the Times) at least one hearty truth expressed; not only to the Royal House of Prussia, but to the entire monarchy, is the approaching union of the two Royal families a "joyful event;" the minority in the country, that does not view this union with most hearty satisfaction, is an infinitesimally small one. All shades of political parties, not even excluding the Kreuz Zeitung, whom we are inclined to look on as hostile to England, simply because they are friendly to Russia, sympathise in the warmest aspirations for the coming alliance; and few Princesses have ever married with a more hearty and country where every heart is so widely and so warmly opened to welcome her, as the Princess Royal will, when she comes hither and takes possession of the little empire of Berlin that is preparing for her in the hearts of her future subjects. Though I must not venture on any details at present, I may at least mention that the men in Berlin whose minutes are most precious are [illegible] the highest order in this country are already, and have been for some months past, devoting their time and thought to find means of best demonstrating the homage that Prussian intellect and heart are prepared to pay to the fair scion of Great Britain's Royal family. From what I know of the man [illegible] and the plans they entertain, I am ready to believe that the execution of them will be worthy the Princess and themselves, but I must not dilate on this further, for, though the betrothal of the young couple has been a public secret for a long time, the plan I allude to [illegible] for the present.

We have received the Portraits of their Royal Highnesses upon the next page.

EXHIBITION OF THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS.

[SECOND AND CONCLUDING NOTICE.]

THE distinctive excellence of the thoroughly English school of landscape art in water-colours consists undoubtedly in the truth of its aerial effects. Turner, by his successes, forcibly directed attention to these effects, and that facility with which they are obtained on paper has often gained them even undue prominence on that subjects. Thus, we have seen that, through various gradations of cold colour, artists have ultimately arrived at representing distant mountains and water with pure blue, causing those objects to appear like so many holes in the picture. In the present Exhibition (always so conspicuous for its landscapes) we are, however, happy to find a marked improvement in this particular. The absorbency of the kind of paper used, and the grain of its surface, the minute depressions of which permit the eye, as it were, to follow the vanishing colour, are the simple and almost sole causes of the case with which the illusive impression of intervening air and distance can be conveyed. And then the equally minute prominences of the paper retaining their reflective lustre will explain the truthful and beautiful luminousness which a tyro can obtain almost as successfully on this preparation of linen as a Pynaker, a Cuyp, or a Claude can obtain the same effect on canvas.

Before confining our attention to the landscape-artists, we must do justice to Mr. Frederick Tayler's admirable painting of animals, as seen in No. 79. Not but that the charming, sweet portraits in No. 121 would place him well among the figure-painters His representations of dogs are, however, unquestionably his most successful efforts. What, for instance, can be better than the busy, alert sagacity of those "Otter Hounds Questing" in No. 68?—the bold, broad whisk of the brush is also so suggestive of their coats.

Mr. Richardson seems to wander annually from Scotland to Italy. We have, as usual, the crag, the torrent, the heath, and the heather of the Highlands, with the indispensable pine in the foreground, which has been torn from the rocky fissures to which it clung in agony by one of the storms which has reeled with drunken fury down those gorges. We have also, as usual, sunny scenes in Calabria, delightfully clear and pure. Mr. Richardson is equally masterly in whatever he attempts. Still, these works convey the impression of a highly artistic effort, rather more than that they are the emanation of a mind which owes everything to nature.

"Haymaking—Lewes, Sussex" (39), by Mr. Davidson, is exquisitely simple and pure in feeling, and very modest—indeed, almost too negative—in colour.

"Martello Tower in Pevensey Bay" (148), by Mr. Naftel, is wonderful for the breadth of tone, the tender stainlessness, and extraordinary luminosity of its sky The gentle march of its serried waves is also beautifully rendered. All the other works of this artist are very brilliant in effect, and positive in colour—which results, however, occasionally in a vivacity which almost sets one's teeth on edge. His still water is very transparent, with here and there the silver-frosting of a ripple or a gleaming reflection from the sky as of burnished steel

"Eisenburg, Switzerland" (115), by Mr. Rosenburg, is admirably true to Alpine scenery the distinctness of everything in the thin air, the pale green velvetty grass; the grain, the chalet, and the fir-trees, the splintered rocks, and the apparently near summit of the Alp, with the snow lodging on the shelves of its primæval granite.

Another Swiss view "The Alps at Sunset" (150), by Mr. Collingwood—has a very fine effect. The clouds are at our feet, and the long level shadow is gradually rising like a deluge soon to quench the rosy light which lingers on the mountain-tops. Yet another scene in Switzerland—"The Source of the Vesp under Mont Rose" is also full of Alpine character. We are fixed here by names and by the stupendous fragments of a pre-Adamite world. By Mr Collingwood there is also much excellent effect.

Mr. Duncan is admirably true to nature in "View of Spithead from the Isle of Wight" (169), and broad and free in execution. As we are only on No. 169 in this artist, we shall have another opportunity of noticing his well-known style.

We have Engraved Mr Collingwood Smith's "Convent of La Madonna del Sasso, above Locarno, on the Lago Maggiore." Very few views, we think our readers will acknowledge, are better adapted for engraving than the glorious scene before us. Apart from the wonderful variety of colour in the picture itself—ranging from the black green masses of the fir foliage to the most delicate tints of the far-off Alpine range, with their opalescent hues, losing their pale snow shadows in the tender blue of cool morning light; apart from all the surpassing loveliness of Italian colour, nothing could be more exquisitely beautiful in form, in composition, and in variegated gradations of tone. It embraces all the elements of the picturesque. The rugged foreground, with its jagged rocks, its flashing—foaming torrent, its sudden ravine, and crumbling bridge, contrast, in their devious outline, so admirably with the still, level lines of the peaceful lake. And, although we have not the blue of the sapphire's hearth gleaming from its deep waters, all must feel how elegantly the contrast is carried out in the middle distance by the ever-varied buildings crowning the jutting and tumbling on the verge of each dizzy precipice. Then the foreground forms are broken and repeated in endless diversity, but softened in character where they sweep away to apparently join the distant mountain-chain thrown from the Spligen—and then they return circuitously, as if to form a guardian cordon of granite round the lovely lago, and screen it from the rustling winds. Contrast, repetition, and variety, are afforded in every part of the picture. Every cleft and crevice of the rocks, even on their perpendicular faces, bristles with vegetation. The lovely aloe unfolds its leaves at the tenacious roots of the stately melancholy pine, and the stunted olives which climb the hill on the left in mournful procession contrast with thin saplings and shrubs, and the graceful festoons of the vine, as they hang suspended on the opposite heights. Talk of being buried in a convent! who would not forsake the world for such a fair scene as this? It is, however, as well calculated to humiliate as to delight and elevate. When the eye ranges over vast panoramic views like this, the mind expands with the impression; but, when, knowing the magnitude of those snow-crested masses in the distance, we look at the rock at our feet, and find it occupies an equal space in the eye of sense, we feel how tiny man's eye is limited and circumscribed in our ordinary life by the conditions of our being and the limitation of our senses: but the same littleness of our nature turns the star into a speck. Let us not complain, however, since experience teaches us that "distance lends enchantment to the view." Every picture will confirm it. To all the inherent charms of the scenery before us the artist has added the exquisite accidental effect described in the lines:

> The morn is up again, the dewy morn,
> With breezy call incense and with cheek all bloom.
> Laughing the clouds away with playful scorn,
> And living as if earth contained no tomb,
> And glowing into day.

[In a small portion of the Edition the Engraving upon the preceding page is erroneously designated "The Alps at Sunset."]

Mr. J. D. Harding gives us "Venice" (12) under the aspect described in the following lines of Byron:—

> The moon is up, and yet it is not night;
> Sunset divides the sky with her.

Objects seen in such an hour, it will be remembered, appear sometimes peculiarly phantasmal when you look, as in this picture, towards the darker part of the sky containing the moon, and Mr. Harding has given this effect very successfully. A view in Switzerland (45) is very forcible and rich in general effect; but we should like to see a little more individuality and character in the detail

"The Harbour, Dort" (157), by Mr. Andrews, is a fine work, full of depth, and with a keen sense of all-pervading atmosphere.

Mr. Brownhite is, perhaps, hardly up to his previous year's mark: still "[illegible] a few rays of his own glowing light in "Kilgerran Castle, South Wales" (3), and the whole scene seems as if preserved in amber—It is rich and deep in tone.

There is much quiet Claude like [illegible] about Mr Finch's "Landscape with Cattle" 21.

The warm and glowing tone in "Linton, North Devon" (135), by Mr. George Fripp, [illegible] and the clearness of No. 82 is still more striking in "[illegible] the road of Glencoe" (37) appears rather woolly, or as if painted on blotting paper. We suppose, however, great allowance must be made for "Scotch mist."

"On the Grand Canal, Venice" (50), by Mr. William Callow, is very mellow and still, with morning effect; as is also No. 165. No. 111, by the brother (?) of this artist, Mr. John Callow, shows boldness and observation; but we suspect the lurid tempestuous sky is a little too brown.

"Plymouth Sound" (93), by Mr. Jackson, is a faithful rendering of the locality, and equally true in its threatening sky. The clouds are worked in leaving a soft absence of grain (similar to pastel-painting), which has a felicitous aerial effect.

We would willingly have avoided any allusion to Mr. Cox's pictures, but as there still appears to be a melancholy wilful infatuation, not only in the artist himself, and his admirers to be unfortunately on the increase, but also in a portion of the public, we are bound honestly to state our impressions. It appears, then, to us that these works have gradually lost very nearly all, not simply of imitative, but even representative or suggestive truth. There was a time when a breadth of handling, apparently utterly oblivious of form, and perfectly incomprehensible when viewed near, yet—owing to the truth of the general effect of the picture assumed at a proper distance, through the wonderful assimilating power of our binocular vision, a startling appearance of reality almost of relief. Now, alas! this quality is gone, and little left but a hopeless unmeaning confusion, in which earth and sky are scarcely distinguishable

The gallery is enlivened by some of Mr. Bartholomew's floral displays, and there is a very excellent fruit-piece (No. 255), by Mr Rosenburg, but we miss the department—still life Mr. Hunt is still preeminent Look, for example at the indescribable consummate mastery in No 291 those apple blossoms, the materials of that nest, the moss, the lichens &c. Perhaps still more astonishing is the relief of the objects in No. 311. The roses, too, have those exquisite partly purplish half tints which are so seldom seen united with their true, natural, delicately-blended transparency and bloom.

Want of scope compels us to the simple mention of the names of the following artists whose works would otherwise claim attention—viz., Messrs. Gastineau, Cox, jun., Holland, and Evans.

MUSIC.

AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE Piccolomini and Giuglini have been the great attractions of the week, dividing their exertions between the "Traviata" and "Lucia di Lammermoor" This latter opera has had a triumphant success, every repetition having drawn overflowing audiences, and being received with the most unbounded enthusiasm. There can be no doubt that the parts of Lucia and of Edgardo are the greatest achievements both of Piccolomini and of Giuglini. The only novelty is the pretty ballet, "Azalista," in which the leading part is sustained by the celebrated Spanish dancer, Madame Perea Nena. In another column we have noticed this ballet, and engraved one of its most prominent scenes.

THERE is now another "Traviata"—at the LYCEUM. It was first performed there on Saturday last. The Violetta is Madame Bosio, who made a great sensation in this part at St. Petersburg last season. Young, beautiful, and graceful, she looks the part as well as possible; she acts with a degree of refinement which scarcely comports with the character, and detracts somewhat from the joyous abandon of the earlier scenes, but [illegible] the pathetic [illegible] with much feeling [illegible] more than [illegible] [illegible] truth and feeling. Her vocal performances [illegible] received with enthusiastic applause, but [illegible] singing [illegible] and [illegible] and clothing [illegible] with the same skill as she did into the florid embroideries with which modern [illegible] the forms beneath. Mario is Alfredo, in which part he first appeared in Paris. His handsome person, [illegible] attire, and distinguished air are quite in keeping; and his rich mellow voice adds to the tone of voluptuous languor which he throws into his singing. In the graver scenes, however, we felt a lack of sensibility and passionate expression. Graziani gave a very fine rendering of the part of the elder Germont, in which he, too, has had great success at Paris. The struggle between the old man's sense of inexorable duty and his kindly and compassionate nature is drawn with true pathos; and his singing, especially of the really affecting air at the conclusion of the second act, is worthy of his acting. The opera is got up with care and completeness. All the decorations are rich, and in good taste; and, notwithstanding the smallness of the stage, the spectacle (particularly in the ball-room scene) is magnificent.

THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY'S third concert took place at the Hanover-square Rooms, on Monday evening. It will be seen from the following programme that it was of even more than ordinary interest.

Conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett

Much curiosity had been for some time excited in our musical circles by the expected arrival of Herr Rubinstein, of Vienna, a young musician, who has gained an immense reputation throughout Germany as a pianist of the very highest order. Before coming to London he visited Paris, where his performances were as successful as they had been in his own country. The Philharmonic Society did their duty to their subscribers by losing no time in engaging an artist of such celebrity, and he made his first appearance in England at this concert. He performed his own music—a concerto with the full orchestra, and two little pieces in the chamber style, and without any accompaniment. He was very warmly applauded; and, though we find that his merits both as a composer and performer have produced much difference of opinion among the critics, yet it appears to us, we think, to be disputed that he is one of the greatest performers of the day. His grasp of hand is remarkable; and the rapidity of his finger, and apparent ease with which he executes very conceivable difficulty, fill the listener with absolute wonder. We never heard such marvels from the hands of Thalberg himself. But execution powers alone their value from the uses to which they are applied, and it is on this head that differences of opinion have arisen. We think, however, that the question as to the intrinsic quality of Herr Rubinstein's music is not to be disposed of after only a single hearing: experience ought to sound musical critics caution on such subjects. Music is not a stationary art; it is always in a state of change, and its changes have hitherto been, on the whole, progressive. When a musician has from time to time appeared, gifted with a bold and original genius, he is slow to gain general favour, for it is difficult to throw off the impressions made by long-established models. There are few musical critics of any length of standing who have not found themselves compelled to abandon opinions, an obstinate adherence to which would leave them behind the progress of art. For ourselves, we confess that there were many things in Rubinstein's performance which we could neither understand nor enjoy, but then there were many things which we both understood and enjoyed, and we are willing, therefore, to believe that when we have heard him oftener we shall understand and enjoy his music more. The performance, for the first time in England, of old Sebastian Bach's fine orchestral work was also an occurrence of great interest. We had an introduction to Dr. Sterndale Bennett, the conductor of these concerts, who is also president of the "Bach Society." It is in the form, usual in the days of Bach and Handel, which preceded the modern symphony, being a suite or series of movements, each of which were named from the particular dances of the time—the Gavotte, the Saraband, the Gigue, &c. The whole work is altogether charming, and the audience found it a rich and welcome treat. The two great symphonies of Mendelssohn and Beethoven were, as usual, superbly played; and Madame Clara Novello, also as usual, sang with all her admirable power and beauty. The rooms were crowded to the very doors.

AT the Concert of the MUSICAL UNION, on Tuesday last, the performances consisted of Haydn's Quartet in D minor, No. 75. Spohr's Trio in F, for piano, violin, and violoncello; and Mendelssohn's Quintet in B flat, Op. 87. M. Sainton was the first violin, Signor Piatti the violoncello, and Herr Hallé the pianoforte [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] sistance; but by the absurd "flank march" the opportunity was lost. The French, too, pursued a plan of "jockeying" the English. They placed them in posts of great danger, and left them to do most of the fighting, whilst they claimed the largest share of glory. The French magazines, also, had been imperfectly constructed, and were accordingly blown up. The feebleness of the flank march to Balaclava was experimentally described; Mr. Russell him self having felt symptoms of indisposition after crossing the river Katscha, and fallen from his pony, whereupon Dr. Alexander advised him "to take care of himself." Many a sick comrade was left in the forest glade, abandoned by companions who were hurried on by the wild impetus of war. The wounded lay by the wayside, imploring assistance, which none might halt to give. In the rear was the marauding Cossack, before them in the distance was promised glory. The preparations for the siege of Sebastopol, and the first day of the bombardment, supplied the lecturer with many touching incidents of description. A large map was used in illustration. He also presented a vivid picture of the battle of Balaclava, by means of a map of the field of battle. The Russians having captured the batteries manned by the Turks the latter ran away towards Balaclava calling out to the English "Ship Johnny!" But our heavy cavalry, suddenly wheeling to meet the advancing enemy, and the enemy was routed by a force not one third of its number. In his descriptions of the Crimean winter he depicted the light cavalry Mr Russell was attached to exercising their horses. Lord Raglan had ordered the commissariat to feed the horses during the early part of the day; afterwards, however, he told them to feed them, saving regretfully, "My Lord, you have lost the Light Brigade!" The charge of Lord Cardigan and his cavalry band had been announced by the French as "not war;" but, said Mr. Russell, "it was war—war in its noblest form, which calls upon a man to disregard life, and to sacrifice all that he holds dear, except his honour and his country; and so long as history has got a page in its volume, whatever may have been the errors of the commanders or the recriminations of the chiefs, the courage of the English soldiers who rode into that cavern of death would always be held sacred in the heart of every Englishman." The final lecture on the Battle of Inkerman, the devastating storm, the sufferings of the winter, the operations on the Sea of Azoff, the Lamburnents and stormings of Sebastopol, and its evacuation by the Russians. In portraying the disastrous assault of the 18th June, and the destruction of Sebastopol, Mr. Russell complained of the want of plan in conducting the operations, and the subordinate position occupied by the British army. The failure of the assault on the Redan gave the French, it was, an opportunity of rectifying a reproach, suffered by themselves after their failure at the Mamelon. "No bono, Frenchy!—no bono, Mamelon!" was then the cry; now it was "No bono, Johnny!—no bono Redan!" The Allied Generals were deserving of censure for allowing the Russians to retreat across the bridge without any attempt to take advantage of the circumstance. In conclusion Mr. Russell stated that "if this country will engage in great wars it must engage great armies; and if those armies be actuated by the same spirit that animated the little army before Sebastopol we need have no fear for our homes or our liberties" Mr. Russell's lectures are to be repeated on the present Saturday, on next Thursday, and the following Monday, at three o'clock in the afternoon

NATIONAL SPORTS.

BATH gave us a peep of Lambourne in rather a better form than he was on the Two-Thousand day. Gin, on brother to British Remedy (the native is, alas! too true), brought the Duke of Beaufort back nearly thrice the 150 gs. he gave for him at the Royal sale last year. Cedric, a 210-guinea son of Touchstone and Rowena, scored the Somersetshire Stakes for Mr. Parker and Woodyeates; and Melissa exchanged his conventional last for a second place. The Derby betting was not of a very exciting order, and Skirmisher kept a firm lead, while Sprig of Shillelagh "hardened," and Saunterer fell from 15s high estate to 26 to 1. We did not warn our readers without reason last week how dangerous a horse this was to touch.

Epsom has all next week to itself and as the Rous Stakes, in spite of its £200 added, has been an utter failure. the Woodcote Stakes (in which Pelly Peachum is the only name of note), the Epsom Cup (comprising Riseber, Arsenal, Polestar, Fisherman, and Gonfer), Verge among its entries—from which the broad-down Fandango will perforce disappear), the Two-Year Old Stakes, and the Great Surrey Foal Stakes (which looks a certainty for Anton) are the only four minor races to which any interest attaches. Unless some rain come the Derby horses seem likely to have a hard time of it, in every sense of the word. Bird-in-the-Hand (Nat) represents John Scott: and Loyola or the Beeswax colt. King of the Forest, Sweet Will m (or "Sugarv Bill." as the touts term him), Waiderskirke, Sprig of Shillelagh, Magnifier (Bullock), Zuyder Zee (Oates), Infidel, (Norman colt, Hampton), Saunterer (Marsh), Lady Hawthorn (Kendall), Arsenal (Gonfer), M.D., Blink Bonny (Jackson, jun.). Schiedam, Qedric, Newton-le-Willows, Lambourne, Old Hurlies, Tournament, Anton (A. Day), Glee Singer, Sydney Dumbey), Adamas, Oakhill, Commotion, and Skirmisher will be seen again, the other principal contents of the field. Bumby will ride Sydney, and most probably succeed to the Baron's "blue and white." The party are most deeply dissatisfied with Charlton's riding for the Two Thousand: but we are convinced that the horse lacks pace, and will be much suited here. Bird-in-Hand has not been tried as yet, in consequence of his gouty legs, and can have but little chance. M.D. has, it is said, beaten Saraband (who gave him 9 lb.) and Martinet, on a trial: and Kent has broken down, and will be spared a second exposé. Saunterer, according to report, won his trial on Saturday, but has gone wrong since, and hence his very position. Sweet William has also, as far as we can learn, had no trial, and reports speak well of Sprig of Shillelagh, as the best of Dawson Zuyder Zee's temper and legs are both doubtful; and we believe that Arsenal, Anton, and Tournament will be found to be mere shams. We expect a very strongly-run race, which will serve Adamas, Skirmisher, and Sydney, and at present that is our relative notion of the merits of the candidates. Skirmisher will, we believe, be ridden by John Osborne, as there seems but little hope of "Job" rousing himself from the sad torpor which has come over him this season. Job Wells may perhaps be on Adamas. Bartholomew tried hard to waste for a Bath mount, but nature would not go below 9 st., and he has resigned the saddle at last. We trust that this unfortunate retirement will bring Teddy Sharpe well forward at Newmarket, as no lad deserves it more.

The Oaks field will be the Arsenal and Stormsail, Ayesanora, Beechnut, Agassia, Lady Hawthorn, Blink Bonny, Imperieuse, Sneeze, Mastissima, Clementina filly, and Vanity, are the most prominent names among the 194. Imperieuse has been tried by the trial by Warlock; and at present, with health on the day, we should whether Mastissima can be defeated.

On Monday the Tattersall sales comprise two of Mr Newton's yearlings, one of which is by Orlando out of Twilight's dam: and twelve of Mr. Mitchell's eighteen. Several Derby prospects, whose sale has become an annual fact. Freedom, who was the premier of them last year, realised 136 guineas, and the other nine averaged 43 guineas. The clever little Nesston harriers (seventeen couples) are for sale, after their season in Yorkshire, as well as seventeen couples of the Heythrop hounds, three of which are unentered. We may add, by-the-by, that Will Maiden has received "Bob" Ward's vacant place as first whip to Lord Southampton.

On Monday the London Model Yacht Club have a third-class sailing match; the Kensington Yacht Club sailing match at Battersea is fixed for Tuesday; and the Birkenhead Model Yacht Club sailing match for Saturday. In consequence of the list of departures for Epsom being so numerous, the great cricket combats for next week are rather scarce The A. E. (who met the U. A. E. at Lord's on June 1) do not play at all; and the latter are matched on Thursday at Oxford against twenty of Christ Church. The old and present Cantabs also meet at Cambridge on Monday, and Caffyn has been astonishing the sister University by a score of 167.

A LARGE FAILURE.—Increased depression has been produced on the Paris Bourse by the failure of a banker and share-dealer of some eminence—viz., M. Barrayesen, who has departed for America. His liabilities are variously stated at from £600,000 to £1,000,000, and serious losses are sustained by Polish residents in Paris. Having large connections with Russia and also with the Polish exiles, his operations were of an exclusive character, and the event has naturally caused some consternation.—Globe.

THE SARDINIAN CONSTITUTION.—The festival of the Constitution was celebrated at Turin on the 16th inst., with great solemnity. All the windows and balconies of the Castello, Contrada di Po, and Piazza Vittorio Emmanuele were decorated with rich drapery and flags At half-past nine, equestrians from the legislative bodies, the members of the municipality, and the diplomatic body attended at the cathedral, at ten, the King, accompanied by the Prince of Carignan and a numerous court, proceeded to the said edifice on horseback. The procession was received at the door by the archbishop, who, after the usual ceremonies, was greeted with loud cheers from the multitude. After the service was over the King received the National Guard and the troops on the Piazzo Castello, the Royal family witnessing the scene from the balcony of the Palazzo Vittorio Emmanuele were decorated with rich drapery and flags At half-past nine, equestrians from the legislative bodies, the members of the municipality, and the diplomatic body attended at the cathedral, at ten, the King, accompanied by the Prince of Carignan and a numerous court, proceeded to the said edifice on horseback. After the service was over the King received the National Guard and the troops on the Piazzo Castello, the Royal family witnessing the scene from the balcony of the Palazzo Vittorio Emmanuele. The members of the diplomatic body occupied the windows of the ministerial palace. Notwithstanding the unfavourable weather the usual horse-races took place on the Piazza d'Armi, and the city was brilliantly illuminated in the evening. An immense number of strangers had arrived at Turin on the occasion, and all the hotels were full.

PRINCE NAPOLEON'S MATRIMONIAL VISIT.—On the 12th inst. the Crown Princess of Prussia arrived at Pillnitz, the residence of the Royal family of Saxony; and on the 14th was joined by the Archduchess Sophia. The Queen of Prussia, the Archduchess Sophia, and the Queens Amelia and Maria, are sisters, and it is now generally believed they have consulted together whether it would not be a good opportunity for the Princess of the Hesse of Saxe to Prince Napoleon on the occasion of the Queen Dowager and Princess Augusta of Prussia being at Dresden. Prince Napoleon went to Dresden as a suitor, and has arrived at Berlin on his return, and is considered a return visit paid to Prince Frederick William of Prussia —Letter from Berlin

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

DURING nearly the whole of the present week the market for all National Stocks has been in a depressed state, and prices have had a downward tendency. The cause of the unfavourable appearance which may be traced to several causes. In the first place, the inquiry for money for discount purposes has been rather active; in the next, large exports of silver to India and China have been recommenced; and, lastly, it is understood that very large supplies of gold will be shortly purchased on account of the Bank of France. The imports of gold, too, from Australia have not kept up to their estimated amount; and we have to report the failure of M. Charles Thurneyssen, banker and sharebroker, of Paris, for nearly half a million sterling. All these features in the market have, as a matter of course, tended to depress the value of Consols, and keep in check large Bull operations. Besides, the Bear party have taken advantage of the present state of the market, only to become Bulls in their turn

Owing to the Derby Day having been fixed for a time past, and its value has steadily improved. The broker operating for the Commissioners of the Savings Banks has purchased £30,000 Exchequer Bills daily; and it is by no means improbable but that Consols may be the next feature for investment, now that Exchequer Bills are fairly afloat.

In the Stock Exchange money has been more abundant than last week, at 6 to 8 per cent on Government security. The Stock Exchange and Gresham-street has been 6½ to 6¾ per cent; and the Directors of the Bank of England have made no change in the value of discounts

Over £700,000, chiefly in silver, has been sent to India and China this week; and about £600,000 will be forwarded by the next packet. The imports have been £120 000 in silver from the Continent and £153,103 from Mexico the West Indies, &c.; and £160,000 from New York Nearly the whole of the gold received has been sent to France.

THE MARKETS.

COAL-TRADE LAST (Friday). The present week's arrivals of English wheat, from the last day's carriage, have been very moderate, and the show of samples here to-day was limited. Fresh up-country parcels met a slow sale, and prices were somewhat supported. We were well supplied with foreign wheat, and the demand for it was steady, at full quotations. About an average business was passed in fine Barley, at fully late rates. Malt has moved off slowly, at barely last week's currency. GREAT BOAT-RACE FOR THE CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE THAMES AND £400.

GREAT BOAT RACE FOR THE CHAMPIONSHIP OF THE THAMES AND £400.

THE great Sculling Race for 200 sovs a side, and the championship of the Thames, between Henry Kelly, of Fulham, and James Messenger, of Teddington, which for nearly twelve months had been the subject of speculation amongst persons fond of aquatic sports, took place on Tuesday afternoon (last week) in the presence of an immense number of spectators—no race for the championship ever having created a greater interest. It is stated in the Sun that Messenger obtained the championship about three years back by defeating the renowned Tom Cole, who had twice defeated the celebrated Robert Coombes; since which time he has had no other challenge until last spring, when Kelly, having won the Scullers Race at the Thames Regatta, and twice defeated Mackinny, immediately challenged the champion—which challenge was duly accepted by Messenger, but was postponed. Kelly, in the mean time, having again won the Scullers' Race at the great Thames Regatta, accepted the challenge of Richard Buttle, of Norwich, to row two races, home and home, for £50 a side each, both of which he won easily. It is, therefore, not surprising that his friends should have been sanguine on this race, making him the favourite at 5 and 6 to 4.

The start took place at seven minutes past four—Kelly, having won the toss for choice of stations, choosing the north, or Middlesex side. After a fair start Kelly immediately took the lead, and off Searle's was a clear boat-length a head. On nearing Craven Cottage he had increased the lead to two boat-length's, and at the Crab-tree to about three, retaining about that lead to Hammersmith-bridge, which distance he performed in nine minutes; from this time he gradually increased his lead, reaching Barnes-bridge in twenty minutes, and doing the whole distance, though not at all pressed, in twenty-three minutes and a quarter, beating Messenger by a minute. The winner rowed in a beautiful new boat built for him by Mr. Taylor, of Newcastle; and Messenger rowed in one of his own boats.

THE FIRST YACHT MATCH OF THE SEASON, ISLE OF WIGHT.

THE season commenced with great spirit at Ryde, on Thursday morning, the 7th inst., when the long-talked-of match round the Isle of Wight came off between the Shadow cutter, 52 tons, Sir Gilbert Easte, and the Coquette schooner, 47 tons, S. Pigott, Esq. The weather was bright and sunny, with a fine fresh breeze from the east. At ten precisely the starting-gun was fired from the R.Y.Y. club-house, when both yachts were under way in first-rate style, canting their heads in to the island—both skippers being wide awake, working their craft up to the Sands head buoy, close in shore, out of the tide. So close were they that it was feared they would ground on the sands. The Coquette, after passing inside the Sands head buoy, laid her course out to Benbridge ledge—the Shadow keeping farther off, apparently to round the Noman; consequently the Coquette was first to pass the ledge (11.30), when up went gaff topsails, squaresail, and balloon-jib, walking off in prime style, with wind and tide in favour. Off Bonchurch the schooner had headed the cutter considerably. After a beautiful run to the Needles, the schooner passed the rocks at 2.13, the cutter at 2.25. Now came the tug: both tide and wind dead against them, it was tack for tack up to Sconce point. The Shadow passed Coquette off the fort, the latter yacht being humbugged by H.M. brig Rolla tacking close on her weather, compelling her to go about and lose her way; the cutter passed on her weather, and gradually increased her distance till she arrived at Ryde 6 1, Coquette at 6.16—no great defeat when the disadvantages of a schooner, compared with a cutter, are taken into consideration, the whole of the course inside the island being a dead beat with short tacks.

The accompanying Illustration is from a sketch by Mr. Fowles, the marine artist at Ryde.

PROSPECTUS
This Railway, about seventy miles in length, will connect Smyrna, the most important seaport in the Levant, with Good Hamar or Aidin, in the most productive part of the interior of Asia Minor. It will bring the two places within three hours of each other, instead of four days as at present.
Smyrna contains a population of 160,000, possesses one of the finest harbours in the world, and takes the highest rank among the trading ports of the Mediterranean.
The aggregate value of her imports and exports in 1856, taken from her Consular returns, amounted to £8,000,000 sterling, and the tonnage inwards and outwards to 950,386 tons.
The extraordinary fertility and resources of Asia Minor are certainly known to her position as a trading emporium, notwithstanding all the disadvantages she has had to contend with from local causes, of even the most ordinary roots and which has from time immemorial fettered the imperative and necessary commerce and trade. When the figs are packed at Aidin, the deterioration now caused, through delay in delivery to ships, by the primitive mode of conveying the enormous crops the mighty rest of the canals, will be avoided. The same may be said in regard to the drain of animals and from numerous other casualties, which frequently occur during the conveyance from [illegible]
[illegible] the port of embarkation, Smyrna, will all be obviated by the [illegible]
[illegible] the cultivated [illegible] Smyrna, which is rapidly increasing in importance, and has already become one of the largest [illegible] of the Levant, and is the point of concourse for [illegible] to it, and the distributing centre for the [illegible] the disposal of produce in small parcels to the resident dealers; trading with Smyrna, and for the purposes of consignments.
According to a low average of the various estimates made by a special commission relative to and on the purpose, whose report has been confirmed by all the principal residents in the town of Smyrna, the goods traffic from Aidin is computed at 10,000 camels and 500 [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

SCENE FROM "LUCIA DI LAMMERMOOR," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

OUR opera-going readers will at once recognise the subject of the accompanying sketch; and it is, therefore, scarcely necessary to explain that the two figures are those of Mdlle. Piccolomini and Giuglini, in the characters of Lucy Ashton and Edgar of Ravenswood. He has burst into the room where the wedding party is assembled, and, having ascertained from the lips of the trembling bride that the signature to the fatal contract is really her handwriting, pours upon her head a torrent of reproaches and imprecations; while she, almost sinking at his feet, is the image of despair and incipient madness This scene, on the part of both performers, is a piece of singularly beautiful and pathetic acting.

SCENE FROM "ACALISTA," THE NEW BALLET AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THIS pretty ballet, got up for the introduction of Madame Perea Nena, the celebrated Spanish dancer, was produced for the first time on Saturday last. It includes several of the national dances, so full of character and so dramatic, which this accomplished artist has already rendered popular at the Haymarket Theatre; but a new and brilliant colouring has been given them by the ingenious framework in which they are set, and the splendour of the grouping and tableaux. The accompanying Sketch represents the beautiful Castanet Dance which concludes the first tableau; the principal figures being Perea Nena as Acalista, the heroine, and M. Baratti as Amyntas, her lover.

SCOTLAND.

THE Parliament of Scotland was first united to that of England in 1707

In Scottish counties the constituency is fixed by the Reform Act, in the same as it was before that date, comprising all tenants in chief of the Crown holding lands of 40s. value (old extent), or of £400 Scots valued rent; together with owners of land of £10 annual value, fifty-seven years leaseholders, lifeholders with a clear £10 yearly interest; yearly tenants paying £50 rent; and all tenants whose interest has cost them £300. In Scottish cities and boroughs the constituency, as settled by the Reform Act, embraces the occupiers of houses of £10 clear annual value, whether as proprietor, tenant, or joint occupier; together with the bona fide owners of such properties, resident or not, and husbands, jure uxoris, after the death of their wives holding by the courtesy of Scotland. These were enfranchised in 1832 in lieu of the burgess-rights and town-councillors, who previously used to choose the representatives.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

ST. JAMES'S PARK.—Earl GRANVILLE, in allusion to the Earl of Malmesbury's observations relative to the expenditure going on by the improvements in St. James's Park said the correspondence which had taken place on the subject should be laid upon the table.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL. The LORD CHANCELLOR brought up a Message from her Majesty similar to that which will be found in our summary of the House of Commons relative to the marriage of the Princess Royal; and the Address in reply was moved by Earl Granville and seconded by the Earl. of Derby. It was unanimously agreed to PROBATES AND LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION. The LORD CHANCELLOR moved that the Probates and Letters of Administration Bill do read a second time, and entered into a lengthened explanation of the machinery by which he proposed to supersede the present testamentary jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts. After some observations from Lord CAMPBELL, the Bishop of LONDON, and other noble Lords, the bill was read a second time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

MARRIAGE OF THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

Lord PALMERSTON brought up a Message from her Majesty, to the effect that she had accepted proposals of marriage between the Princess Royal and his Royal Highness Prince William of Prussia. Her Majesty had thought fit to communicate this to her faithful Commons, not doubting their concurrence and their aid in making such a provision for the marriage of her eldest daughter as was suitable to the honour of the Crown and the dignity of the country

The Message having been read by the Speaker,

Lord PALMERSTON spoke in high terms of the excellent qualities of her Royal Highness and Prince William, from which he augured the happiest results, and adverted also to the political consequences of the union, which might be productive of great advantages to this country. He would not then pledge any hon. member to any of the details of what might be proposed, and would therefore only move an Address, assuring her Majesty of their loyalty and affection, and that, on an early day, her Message would be taken into consideration.

Mr DISRAELI seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously; after which Lord PALMERSTON intimated that on Friday next he would move that the Message be taken into consideration.

REFLECTIONS ON THE ARMY.

On the order of the day for the House resolving itself into a Committee of Supply,

Colonel NORTH called attention to a speech made by Mr. W. Williams to his constituents of Lambeth, in the course of which he had reflected upon the officers of the British army. The statement he referred to was in the Times newspaper, and he called upon the hon. member to substantiate his charge if he could

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said he had never made any such statement He had never vilified the officers of the British army, for he believed the regimental officers were the best and bravest in the world. He might, however, have expressed a different opinion as to the abilities of the higher officers in that army

Sir W. JOLLIFFE-GROSVENOR said that election speeches should not be, perhaps, too closely scanned, for they were often very incorrectly reported, and he therefore accepted Mr. Williams's disclaimer as satisfactory. He then referred to an attack made upon the Duke of Cambridge in the Times, and read a letter from an officer who witnessed that gallant officer's conduct at the Battle of Sobraon, when he attempted, in the face of a terrific fire, to ride his horse into one of the entrenchments, a well-served battery, and, failing, rode back a short distance, and then, calling on his troops to follow him, actually succeeded in leaping into another embrasure, escaping death by almost a miracle

THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

The House then went into Committee; and

Sir C. WOOD proceeded with the Navy Estimates, which for this year would be in round numbers, £6,074,000; of which £3,389,600 had been already voted by the last Parliament

A desultory conversation ensued; in the course of which,

Admiral WALCOTT enforced the propriety of keeping twelve sail of the line constantly in commission, that our seamen might be prepared for all emergencies; and he also advocated the necessity of maintaining a gunnery revolution.

Sir C. NAPIER thought the Navy Estimates might be in some respects increased with great advantage to the efficiency of the service. As the naval force now stood, it was inefficient for the protection of the country in the event of a sudden war

Lord C. PAGET thought the Admiralty ought to consult with a committee of experienced naval officers to the eligibility of the smaller classes of vessels of war over line-of-battle ships, as being more useful in many respects, and superior even in action, if numerous in proportion to the armament of the latter.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS characterised the present Navy Estimates as the most extravagant since the conclusion of the French war, excepting those during the late war with Russia; and yet those were the estimates which Sir C. Napier thought might be increased

The vote for 53,709 men for the navy and marine forces was ultimately agreed to.

The remainder of the evening was chiefly occupied in the discussion of the remaining estimates.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

THE DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR moved the second reading of the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill. Repudiating any purpose of rendering the disruption of the marriage tie more frequent or easy, he nevertheless believed that the present law in relation to matrimony and divorce was surrounded by complications, and, above all things, by expenses which required reformation. He then sketched the condition of the marriage laws in different countries, and in England at various periods of past history. Adverting to the bill which he had laid before the House, the Lord Chancellor remarked that the changes he proposed to introduce were based upon the report of a Royal Commission appointed in the year 1850. At present the law required not less than three processes before any suitor could obtain a divorce a vinculo matrimonii, or action for crim. con., a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court, and a suit in Parliament. Applicants were thus obliged to prove their cases three times over, and by a most expensive course of proceeding, before they could obtain relief from the marriage bond. For this triple machinery he proposed to substitute a single suit before a specially constituted court. This tribunal was to consist of the Lord Chancellor, a Chief Justice, and a Judge of the Court of Probate. The evidence would be taken viva voce, and, generally speaking, submitted to a jury. He proposed to give this court jurisdiction over all matrimonial suits, with full power to grant divorces in all the degrees now obtainable either from the Ecclesiastical Courts or from Parliament. The limitation being preserved that no dissolution of marriage, to the extent of permitting the parties to marry again, should be lawful excepting only in case the divorce was granted on proof of adultery

After a few remarks from the Archbishop of CANTERBURY,

Lord LYNDHURST expressed his approval of the principle on which the bill was founded, but contended that the object was imperfectly worked out in detail. He thought it most unjust to debar the wife from equal relief under circumstances which were held to entitle the husband to a divorce, and that wives should not be released from subjection, so far as their persons and property were concerned, to husbands who had deserted them. On these points he intimated his intention to propose amendments when the bill came to be discussed in committee

The discussion was continued by Lord Wensleydale, the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Campbell, Lord Dungannon, the Bishop of Oxford, and other Peers. The motion was finally carried on a division, on which there appeared—Contents, 47; Non-contents, 18; 29.

The bill was then read a second time

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY

Mr. BENTINCK obtained leave to introduce a bill amending the present acts designed to prevent the spread of contagious or infectious disorders among cattle, sheep, and other animals

On the motion of Mr. BAXTER, an address was ordered to be presented to the Crown for a copy of the report prepared by Dr Arthur Lyons on the pathology of the diseases prevalent among the British forces in the East

AGGRAVATED ASSAULTS BILL. The second reading of this bill was opposed by Sir G. GREY, who objected, among other details of the measure, to the summary jurisdiction it gave the magistrates in cases of assaults on women. Mr. DILLWYN briefly defended the bill, and the House divided—For the second reading, 98; against, 221: 135.

MINISTERS' MONEY.

Mr FAGAN moved the second reading of the Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill. He recapitulated, in considerable detail, the history of the many previous attempts to legislate on the subject, describing the origin of the tax called "ministers' money," and enlarging upon the grievance it occasioned, and the irritation of which it was the constant source.

Mr. BRAMSTON seconded the motion.

Mr. NAPIER moved as an amendment that the second reading should be deferred for six months. The measure was, he declared, a direct invasion of the rights of property, and violated the legislative enactments finally concluded by the Church Temporalities Act. Observing that every successive Government for the past ten years had opposed the bill, he expressed his suspicion that Lord Derby had consented now to support it through some pressure from the Irish members, and without having examined the question sufficiently to be aware of the very serious issues involved.

Sir G. GREY denied that the bill led to any such important consequences, or compromised either the faith of the Legislature or the rights of property. Pursuing the subject into its detail, he maintained that the change proposed by the bill did not differ in principle from many settlements that had been previously effected and had worked well. Under the Act of 1838, the controversy respecting ministers' money was left in a state of great complication, and almost interminable lawsuits were inevitable unless Parliament interposed to prevent so discreditable a result. The time was now arrived, according to his anticipation expressed some years ago, when a stop should be put to the collection of a tax which caused so much trouble and disturbance.

Mr. WHITESIDE denounced the bill for the sake of the important principle it would imperil. With the measure, in his belief, was bound up the maintenance of Church-rates in England, of the Annuity-tax in Scotland, and the appropriation of the whole ecclesiastical properties in Ireland. The hon. and learned member supported this view of the question by copious references to historical records and proceedings in Parliament.

Mr. FREMANTLE, who spoke from a back Ministerial bench, pointed out that ministers' money was a creation of Parliament. Its imposition was first established by an Act passed in 1663, and what Parliament had done he maintained that it was competent to undo.

Mr. BLAKE, in supporting the bill, related many instances of oppression, leading sometimes to acts of violent revenge, arising out of the attempts to enforce the obnoxious tax under discussion.

Sir F. THESIGER reiterated and enforced the argument that the minister's money belonged to the property assigned to the Protestant Church in Ireland by the Act of Settlement, and confirmed by many subsequent enactments. It could not be touched without committing a violation of public faith and shaking the tenure on which all property was held in the United Kingdom. He proceeded to enlarge upon the vacillation and inconsistency that had characterised the conduct of the Government on the question.

Mr FITZGERALD defended the Administration and supported the bill. He challenged the assertion that it involved a question of property, whether lay or ecclesiastical. The ministers' money was nothing but a tax established by Parliament originally, and devoted to purposes with which the Legislature was fully entitled to deal.

Lord J. RUSSELL observed that the objections to the tax were founded on its practical operation. It was obnoxious to a large section of the community, was collected in a vexatious manner, and did more harm than the object upon which it was expended could justify. The policy, therefore counselled its abolition—a step for which, he believed, there were ample precedents.

Mr. WALPOLE likened the tax to the Church-rate impost in England. Both were Church Property, and stood on the same principle, which could not be attacked without striking at the foundation of all property

Lord PALMERSTON described the efforts that had been made by the Legislature, and especially in the Act of 1854, to retain the tax, while depriving it of all obnoxious and irritating characteristics in the mode of its collection. Those endeavours had, however, failed, and the Government had accordingly come to the conclusion that no other course was available but a total abolition. This determination had been reached early in the late Session, before a dissolution was expected, and without any reference—such as had been suggested by the opponents of Government—to the exigencies of a general election.

On a division the second reading of the bill was carried by a majority of 313 to 174: 139

ON THE TRANSFER OF LAND.

TO THE RIGHT HON. THE VISCOUNT PALMERSTON, K.G., FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY, M.P., ETC., ETC., ETC.

MY LORD,—

IT has been the misfortune of most individuals who have ventured upon the task of exposing the abuses and errors of systems, and the evils which the maintenance of them entails upon the community, to find, that they are continually met with much opposition, and by objections, often founded upon argument, but chiefly arising from preconceived notions and prejudices, or presumed self-interests; and also from the apprehension that any alterations or amendments may be calculated to interfere with existing positions of influence and power; —notwithstanding that the proposals enunciated may be perfectly rational and constitutional, of vital importance to the nation and to the advancement of those permanent benefits which the country is justly entitled to demand

Hence it is that year after year passes away, and appeal after appeal is made, and the public mind can be roused from its supineness and indifference, and to devote attention to grave and momentous questions. It is true that in the interim we have commissions appointed, succeeding each other at protracted periods, and at no slight cost, to examine and inquire into various matters, which facts and every day's experience have already adapted in such full detail, that it is almost an insult to ordinary common sense to attempt to conceal or disavow them; and which it is alike a reflection upon our presumed knowledge and intelligence as a nation, that we permit to continue.

Fortunately, however, there is one consideration of magnitude upon which a unanimous opinion has been concentrated—namely, "that the development of the resources of a great empire cannot be overestimated:" this development being naturally dependent upon the combination of practical experience and skill, judicious enterprise, the due encouragement of industrial labour, aided by an uninterrupted circulation of capital: and lastly, and most essentially, upon the facility of dealing with the land.

It may therefore, perhaps, be thought as not altogether unworthy of deep reflection, nor inopportune, upon the assembling of a new Parliament, and when (with the exception of China) we are happily at peace with the nations of the world, and in furtherance of a great national object, to determine how far other and improved conditions, as contrasted with those which now prevail, would operate in bringing into full action all the elements alluded to, and most particularly in respect to that vast amount of property comprehended under the term "landed, or real and fixed;" and also, what might be the effect upon our financial position as to taxation and the future requirements of Government for the annual expenditure? And, doubtless, it will at once be conceded that any impediment or check whatever to that freedom of progress which is essential to the increasing of the products of the soil, must interfere very prejudicially with the profitable employment of labour and the accumulation of national wealth.

Now, what is the actual position of the greater portion, and, indeed, with comparatively slight exception, of the landed and other real property of this kingdom, embracing England and Wales, Ireland and Scotland?

It is fettered and enveloped, nay, it may literally be said, to be as it were, engulfed in the most ingeniously-contrived, complicated, technical and extended, but at the same time absurd and useless, forms of legal procedure; and, indeed they been purposely invented to counteract, defeat, and crush the real and legitimate interests of those who have been led to suppose them to be of imperial necessity for the security of themselves and their possessions, success could not have been achieved more completely. May it not then be asked, wherein consists that transcendent merits which have been ascribed to and imagined to attach to them.

Is it in the entanglement of titles and of almost all other matters which have been caused by them; with the tardiness, uncertainty, and apparently interminable difficulties and disputes they involve;—not only tending most unfairly to depreciate the value of property, but rendering compulsory a constant resort to the Courts of Equity and Law for explanations and decisions upon points of meaning and construction; and very often the final and doubtful issue of an appeal to that august and noble assembly, the House of Lords; where it is no rare occurrence that the most distinguished and eminently-learned propounders and expositors of the law differ in opinion, and the judgments of the courts are reversed.

Again, are these transcendent merits to be discovered in the continuous and destructive expenses, and the enormous losses which are occasioned by delays, apart from the severe disappointment and inconvenience sustained by all parties concerned; or in the personal antipathies and unchristianlike animosities which are engendered in the progress of suits, or in the widows' tears, the orphans' cries, or the "Bleak Houses," with the utter prostration of hundreds of families and their connections, thus inflicting incalculable injury upon the people?

May it not further be permissible humbly, and with all deference and respect, to inquire whether it be of slight importance to attempt, by legislative measures, to overcome so fearful and calamitous a state of things, and to free the land from such a monstrous incubus? Or is it not rather a work that has become imperative and almost paramount to any other in which honorable and independent men can be embarked with pride and satisfaction; and will it be contended that it cannot be accomplished?

Then, inasmuch as the evils herein portrayed, and their fatal and disastrous consequences cannot be denied, but on the contrary, have been ever and ever again acknowledged to be true (and even by some of the highest legal authorities), the simple question is—What is the remedy?

The remedy has been already in a great degree exemplified, in the unqualified success of that section of the Encumbered Estates Act in Ireland, namely, "the investigation and confirmation of titles, as preliminary to all sales and transfers; thereby rendering the completion of contracts immediate and certain, and establishing the free and prompt interchange of money and property."

This principle can be as readily adapted and extended to all sales and transfers under any circumstances, and to all mortgages, securities, and arrangements whatsoever, by a law making the practice universal, and compulsory, and applying the same form and plan to England and Wales and to Ireland and Scotland. And are they not a United Kingdom? The machinery for the purpose being uniform, clear, and simple, and coupled with progressive general registration—such registration partaking of a mercantile and commercial feature, instead of a technical, complex, and lengthened one; and to be so guarded and held inviolable against improper and impertinent obtrusion, as to be as sacred as the books of the Bank of England. Thus, for a safe and practicable course, and without interference with any well-founded rights of property, or with the privilege of entails and settlements, the facility sought for, and so much to be desired, would be attained for the future; and, whilst it would be certain to afford the most ample and efficient security, it would be the means of checking and preventing much mischievous, painful, and unnecessary litigation.

Then, as it can be demonstrated by those who have had the longest experience and the most extensive dealings in landed and other real property, that out of the thousand titles throughout the United Kingdom 999 would be found to be sufficiently valid for all purposes, they would, consequently, be such as would justify confidential boards of well-qualified, impartial, and disinterested commissioners in placing from time to time their seal of confirmation upon them, under the authority of an Act of Parliament.

Now at this period the aggregate amount of the returns upon which the Property and Income Tax is assessed may be taken at about £240,000,000; and thus a criterion is afforded for conjecturing what might be the gradual increase in the annual value of the property and income of the nation at large, arising out of the facility of dealing with the land, and the greater rapidity of the circulation of capital; and the probability, therefore, is that in a few years it might reach £340,000,000 or £400,000,000; and hence it becomes obvious that, whilst the general wealth of the country would progressively increasing, and its power to meet its pecuniary obligations be expanded, the public burdens might be proportionately diminished, and the prosperity, comfort, and happiness of all classes be promoted.

I have the honour to be,
My Lord,
Your Lordship's faithful and most obedient servant,
ALEXANDER RAINY.

Regent-street, St. James's, May, 1857.

[a] The principle of a stamp and confirmation of titles, as preliminary to contracts for sales and purchases, mortgages, &c., was enunciated and embodied in a programme, submitted by me, after the repeal of the Corn laws in 1846, to the late Earl Cottenham (then Lord Chancellor of England, and to the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, at their Lordships' desire, and the state of Ireland, with its peculiar difficulties, was also referred to in correspondence with the late Sir Robert Peel, and the principle alluded to was engrafted upon the Encumbered Estates Act. Whatever defects in other respects may pervade that Act, or however severe may have been its application upon individuals, in the early stage of its working, yet that Act, by so far freeing the land, may be said to have laid the foundation for the progressive and the future material prosperity of that interesting and valuable portion of her Majesty's dominions. But a similar Act is not called for or required for England or Wales, or Scotland, as the circumstances differ in many respects, and the facility of transfer may be arrived at without one of so extreme and peremptory a nature, nor would it, perhaps, be wise or expedient to hand over the transactions of the Encumbered Estates Court to the Court of Chancery. Most impartial men who have watched the course of proceedings in the Court of Chancery may possibly consider that that Court already embraces more than an amplitude of business; and that no benefit could accrue to the public from the expansion of its powers or control. But, on the contrary, that it might be an improvement if portions of its authority and practice were transferred to other tribunals, whose proceedings might be less circuitous, technical, and mysterious, and more intelligible of comprehension and speedy in result. It was said not long since by a barrister of the Common Law Courts, "That if the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery was extended, all law would soon be swallowed up in equity," whereupon a Chancery barrister replied, "That if the views he learned friend had just propounded were adopted, all equity would become absorbed in law." Perhaps it may with truth be observed that the fusion of law and equity, so that strict justice might be ensured, and decisions be arrived at with promptitude, would prove most congenial and satisfactory to the public.

SARDINIAN ANTIQUITIES, ADELAIDE ROOMS, WEST STRAND.—Although the Island of Sardinia is in the very centre of the Mediterranean, and about equidistant from France, Italy, and Spain, there is scarcely any part of Europe that is more completely a terra incognita than this island. The few travellers who have penetrated into the interior pronounce the country to be highly picturesque, abounding in wooded mountains and rich valleys. On the other hand, agriculture vegetates the plains, and the inhabitants, except those in Cagliari, Sassari, and some other places, are in a semi-barbarous state, and have nothing in common with the Piedmontese subjects of his Sardinian Majesty. In the time of the ancients, first Phenician and then Roman colonies covered the coast. But the archæology of this island has been little known; we were, therefore, highly gratified by a visit to the antiquities lately discovered in the necropolis of Tharros, which is situated on a bay of the west coast of the island, facing Spain. The excavations were undertaken in 1855-6, by Cavalier Giovanni Cara, director of the Royal Museum of Cagliari. Tharros was the seat of an important Phenician colony. If this extraordinary maritime people carried their enterprise far beyond the Pillars of Hercules, it is not surprising that in a locality so near Carthage so many relics should have been carried of such peculiarity and manufacture. The gold trinkets of this collection are not only interesting but of unusual number and variety, being composed of necklaces ornamented with gems and glass balls of various colours, enamels and amulets in ivory, with Phenician characters. There are also many scarabs mounted in gold, of which no less than thirty-five varieties are enumerated, forming rings. The scarabs not mounted are much more numerous. The glass amphoræ are very fine—one, like a theodolite, with the water hermetically closed from the period of the first manufacture, but still glistening as it flows when shifted by the hand. One of these amphoræ is particularly remarkable by its fine lilac and pearl lustre, as precious to the antiquarian as the ruby lustre of the potters of Umbria to the dilettanti of the cinque cento. There is a large admixture of the ordinary Egyptian amulets and Roman utensils many of no particular interest; the cream of the collection has been the Phenician relics. One or two cinque-cento objects are also noticeable, particularly a large ivory bust of one of the Medici, which is worthy to figure in the "Soulages Collection." In conclusion, this one is largely alloyed with objects found in all museums of classical antiquity; but there is a sufficient number of rarities to make it well worthy of a visit. We understand that the whole of the objects will be brought to the hammer of Messrs. Christie in the month of June.

COLOURED PHOTOGRAPHY.—PROCESS OF MR. LAROCHE.—Simultaneously with the discovery of photography, criticism began to depreciate its merit by pointing out with no inconsiderable success the points in which it was inferior to painting by hand. The popularity of the invention was also considerably retarded by its being practised by persons who had a knowledge of the manipulation of chemicals, but who were unacquainted with the principles of beauty as well as of drawing—for a good photographer must be an artist as well as a technician. Every countenance and every frame has a pleasant and an unpleasant aspect, which the eye of the artist must at once discern. A slight difference of pose may make a sitter clumsy or elegant, and the slightest inclination of the head may conveniently foreshorten a nose or a limb which nature may have abnormally elongated. Photography has, therefore, made a great advance since artists by profession have taken to it, and since a knowledge of colour has been expended on the outlines, and light and shade determined by sunlight with such absolute certainty. The great defect of a water-coloured photograph is that it is not permanent—fading rapidly, covering as it does oxide of silver. In colouring with oil, the identity of lineament disappears. Colouring on prepared ivory is brilliant at first, but gradually turns yellow. We therefore see with satisfaction the discovery by a Mr. Laroche of a new medium, which produces most brilliant colour without interfering with the most infinitesimal degree of expression; and a visit to his rooms, at 68, Oxford-street, has enabled us to see a series of portraits of well-known characters, which in beauty and brilliancy remind us of the productions of Thorburn and Ross. Such, for instance, are the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean in the "Winter's Tale," with all the accessories as perfect as a Guérin or a David. What the medium is we cannot pretend to guess, as it is an unpatented secret. We can only say that we have seen nothing in coloured photography combining so much truth and brilliancy as these portraits by the new process of Mr. Laroche.

NEW CONSERVATORY OR WINTER GARDEN.—Messrs. Weeks and Co have just added to their nursery establishment, in the King's-road, Chelsea, a spacious and elegant conservatory or winter garden. The large size of this structure, which was erected in less than six weeks, connected as it is with not less than twenty-six other compartments, the whole heated from one boiler through the medium of not less than 7000 feet of pipe, on the plan of Weeks's one boiler system, must strike every visitor. The frontage of these premises extends some 130 feet, and the elegant structures, filled with the productions of both hemispheres and of every clime, occupy an area of nearly 20,000 feet. The collection of plants is one of the most complete in existence. Among the number of magnificent specimens, evidently brought together at a vast outlay, are rich masses of azaleas, rhododendrons, cerias, New Holland and Australian plants, pelargoniums, and roses; noble specimens of the Dammara Australis, the Auracaria excelsa, the Aralia trifoliata, orange-trees in various stages, the lovely magnolia, &c. Among the tropical plants is the luxuriant Musa Cavendishii, and in splendid fruit—that valuable plant so effectually introduced into the gardens islands of the South Pacific by the lamented missionary, Williams. In the garden is a gigantic specimen of the Agave Americana variegata, verging on 100 years of age, and expected to bloom next year. It has been for ninety-four years in the family of Mr. Gruneberg, the managing partner of the establishment, his father having been during a long life eminent as a nurseryman in Germany. Messrs. Weeks's establishment has been visited by a very considerable number of persons of distinction during the last few days, to whom the new conservatory and its magnificent contents have afforded the highest gratification.

PRODUCTION OF OIL, CANDLES, AND SPIRIT, FROM THE EARTH.—Mr. Stephen White, of Liverpool (the well-known patentee of the hydro-carbon gas, or gas from water), has succeeded in obtaining very singular and valuable products, applicable to a variety of useful purposes, from a peculiar earth which flows spontaneously from the earth into wells at Rangoon, in the Burman Empire. These wells are in great number, and are about 150 feet deep. The oil flows into them continuously, and is drawn up by the pumps into pots, and collected. The annual produce of these springs of oil is upwards of 90,000 gallons. It is used by the natives for cooking, torchlights, and other domestic purposes. Mr. White has patented the invention. He subjects the crude oil to distillation in a novel and ingeniously-arranged series of stills, working together, the one into the other, which produces at the same time three distinct substances viz. paraffine, perfectly solid; an oil, and a spirit. The paraffine is obtained in very large quantities, and, when purified, is beautifully white and transparent. When made into candles it burns with a brilliancy unequalled by any other substance. The oil, when subjected to the purifying process, is obtained almost colourless and transparent. It is extremely valuable for lubricating the fine machinery of the cotton, silk, linen, and woollen manufacturer; and has better lubricating properties than the finest sperm oil which of late years has become scarce and much adulterated with inferior oils. The patent oil affords a clear and powerful light when burned in a lamp; and has the singular property of preserving metals from the corrosive influence of the atmosphere, or salt water, &c.: when applied to the copper coating of ships, the preservative effect is very striking. The spirit, or naphtha, affords an admirable light when used in a spirit-lamp; and has also valuable preservative effects when applied to telegraph wires or other metals

THE MANCHESTER ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE Exhibition having now been open a fortnight, people have made themselves, in some degree, familiar with the nature of its contents, and have fixed upon certain points of particular attraction, according to their several tastes, and begin to settle down in groups round particular objects, which have been singled out and pronounced as of extreme interest. Having a predilection for chronological arrangement, we shall in the present paper confine ourselves to the ancient masters, and of those the Italian, who justly rank the first; reserving other schools for future notice. And certainly one of the most remarkable incidents in the conduct of the public at this great art-gathering, as evidencing the growing love for art-culture, is found in the crowds which constantly congregate about the entrance of Saloon A, upon the west and northern walls of which are hung the works of the very early Italian school, intermixed with a few specimens of Byzantine art of no great importance—the Cimabues, Guido da Sienas, Giottos, Orcagnas, and others of the devout religious labourers who, as it were, cleared and paved the way for the grand Scriptural art which was to follow; and, when they retired from the sphere they so modestly occupied, left many a hint which Michael Angelo and Raphael did not disdain to adopt and improve upon. It is by studying these rude but full-souled works that we discern the first lispings of a new language, which was shortly afterwards to swell into the full volume of poetic development under the master spirits last mentioned. Of Cimabue we have a small piece of the "Madonna and Child" (with Scriptural subjects on each side), which is a counterpart in miniature of the celebrated colossal "Madonna," which set all Florence in ecstasies when it was moved to its location in the Santa Maria del Fiore—an incident so graphically treated by Mr. Leighton in his large picture, now the property of her Majesty, which is to be seen at the head of the Modern Gallery hard by. By Giotto are two undoubtedly original specimens (14 and 16), being parts of frescoes cut away from the Carmine Church at Florence; but they are small in size, and dimmed with age; and any one who would think of judging of this great master's talent (as the happy companion of Dante and Petrarch) from these specimens would be grievously in error. It is in his great works in the Arena Chapel, at Padua, at Assisi, and at Naples, that the scope of his genius is to be discerned; and of these, fortunately, very satisfactorily-engraved copies exist.

In the central compartment, between the doors, the attention is arrested by, amongst various others of high excellence, seven very remarkable predella pictures by Ugolino da Siena, pertaining to a great altarpiece, formerly in the possession of W. Young Ottley, the well-known collector and critic. Waagen says of these pictures:—"The peculiar position of this great master, who died at an advanced age in 1339, placed as he was between the old Byzantine mode of conception and painting and Giotto's new method, introduced into Siena by Duccio di Marmi, is very apparent in these fragments." To which we can add that, with all the examples of later art, art of the most accomplished schools, now before us and surrounding us, we can point to none which for purity and grandeur of sentiment, unaffected pathos, and power of story-telling come near these small pale productions of the subjects they treat. We will name them subjects in order—viz., 1. "The Last Supper." Mark the affecting incident of one of the disciples, St. John probably, overcome with emotion at the announcement of his betrayal just made by the Saviour, leaning forward, and resting his head upon his shoulder; the other figures, marked as they are with appropriate gravity, manifest their astonishment and horror in the manner they look about, one to the other, as if for explanation and reassurance. 2. "Christ Betrayed in the Garden," a finely-grouped subject; the expression in the face of Christ whom Judas kisses, is one of sublime pathos and dignity, in which sorrow more than resentment prevails. 3. "Christ Scourged"—a simple composition of three figures, Christ being fastened to a pillar in the centre: very like, by the way, the treatment by Michael Angelo of the same subject in the little picture at the other end of the same saloon. 4. "Christ led to Crucifixion"—another full, well-studied group. See the brutal passions manifested in the Jewish priesthood and in the soldiery, and contrast with it the sublime anguish of the Saviour, who still casts his regards back with tender recognition upon his mother, who follows, bearing up with more than human effort against her soul's anguish; Raphael's celebrated "Spasimo" is not more touching in the design than this fine composition, whilst it shocks good taste, in the writer's opinion, by the repugnant incident of representing the Christ, the Saviour of Mankind, crouching in the dust beneath the weight of his cross, whilst his savage persecutors drag and goad him on like an animal of the inferior creation. 5. "The Taking Down from the Cross," and 6, "The Entombment:" of these Waagen says, "They belong, in every respect, to the finest aspirations I have ever seen of these subjects." The former subject, it may be mentioned, in its treatment, bears a striking resemblance to the celebrated alto-relievo, by Nicolo Pisano, over the door of the Cathedral Church of Lucca (engraved in Ottley's "Italian School of Design")—a work which, it is well known, exercised a considerable influence upon the revival of painting even before the appearance of Cimabue. These coincidences—of which we could mention many more had we space—so far from detracting from, add to, the interest of these early works, as by watching them closely, and in their various ramifications, one can almost trace the artelligree of Michael Angelo and Raphael in direct descent from these early masters, till lately so little known, even by name, by admirers of pictures. The last of the seven subjects is the "Resurrection," which is treated with great severity: a bleak, rocky district; four soldiers asleep in the foreground, and Christ rising, in a simple, erect posture, out of the tomb.

Above the remarkable series just described are a row of six very fine heads of saints (to which there is neither name nor number, but evidently of a fine period of the revival), the countenances being full of character, and drawn and coloured with a firm free hand. Above these again is a Madonna crowned by Christ, attributed to Giotto, in which we discern the simple and modest treatment which the early masters gave to this subject—such a favourite in the Romish Church. The Virgin is represented young (just as Michael Angelo represents her in his celebrated sculpture of the Pieta), as it she that was so pure and free from human passion could not show the marks of age, attired in a flowing white drapery, her head slightly bowed forward as if in submission before him who, though by mysterious dispensation her son on earth, was yet in heaven coeternal with the Father; her hands crossed meekly before her innocent breast; whilst Christ puts the crown upon her graceful head. This treatment of the subject we find almost universal with the artists of this period. Several examples of the kind are in the present Exhibition; in one of which, close by, the Madonna is represented kneeling before the Saviour. In this compartment also is the small piece of "The Last Supper," by Giotto, from the collection of Lord Ward, and formerly in the Bisenzio Collection. It is remarkable for the simplicity and gravity of the treatment.

There are other works by, or attributed to, Giotto at this end of the room, some of which we shall notice:—In No. 22 there are indications of naturalness and character which were not seen before his day. No. 19, a "Crucifixion," with, on the left, a pathetic group of the Marys, the Madonna having fainted; and on the right a soldier, who, in an attitude of admiration and devotion, testifies his belief in the divinity of the crucified Saviour. No. 18, "The Death of the Virgin," is a large picture (7 feet by 3 feet), and painted with a greater body of colour, and after a more ambitious manner as regards attitude and expression, than any of the others. The Apostles kneel around the dead body of the Madonna, which is extended on a couch, some of them looking up in devout aspirations to heaven (their faces remarkably foreshortened), where is seated in a glory the Saviour, who holds before him, upon a napkin, the soul of the Virgin, represented as a child praying. This is a striking work, and deserves careful study.

Close at hand is an interesting work by Simone Memmi, a pupil of Giotto, who was celebrated for his power of expression—a reputation which this little picture fully supports. It represents "Christ Returning to his Parents" (No. 20), and is the property of the Liverpool Royal Institution. The composition consists of three figures only,—Joseph in the centre, who has just brought in the youthful Christ (who is represented as of boyish stature), and who points with feeling to the Madonna who is seated on the left: the expression in her face shows that she has passed many hours of anxious, heart-wearing watching; yet the maternal joy in recognition of her son seems to predominate over all. Joseph, as he points to Mary, looks round upon Jesus with an air of persuasive reproach; whilst the latter, with submissive and somewhat troubled expression, free, however, from anything approaching to humiliation, appears to feel and acknowledge the justness of the parental rebuke. Altogether this work is wonderful for its naïve conception.

A "Virgin and Child" (23), by Filippino Lippi, a pupil once removed of Giotto, is a marvellous little gem. Scrutinising it again and again, every time with a fresh eye, one can hardly bring oneself to believe that it is not attributable to some favoured master of the Raphaelesque period—to Raphael himself; for the graceful disposition of the figures, the charming, innocent expression, combined with the soft, delicate finish, leave nothing for the imagination to desire.

The part of a fresco by Spinello Aretino (195), representing St. Michael and angels combating with the hosts of Satan, is of a different class—one of the few frescoes in the Exhibition. It is part of a celebrated picture representing the Fall of Lucifer in the Church of Sta. Maria degli Angeli at Arezzo, and was painted about the middle or end of the fourteenth century. It comprises the upper part of the figure of St. Michael, with six angels advancing from the left, in menacing attitudes, and with lances in their hands. There is great simplicity in the arrangement of the figures, and a firm, calm dignity in the faces; the sole exception in the former respect being the figure of one angel, which is in a front view and comes down from the back, being rudely foreshortened, the introduction of which was a daring experiment, considering the period

Another glance will carry us over the rest of these painters of the Pre-Raphaelite period.

MARBLE STATUE OF HER MAJESTY IN PEEL PARK, SALFORD.
M. NOBLE, SCULPTOR.

MARBLE STATUE OF HER MAJESTY, IN PEEL PARK, SALFORD.

THIS fine statue, inaugurated by Prince Albert on the 6th inst., originated with the Sunday-school teachers and scholars of Manchester, and it was raised to commemorate the visit of her Majesty in 1851, when 80,000 Sunday-school children assembled together in Peel Park, to give her welcome. Monuments have been erected to heroes by the pence of the people, and to successful commanders by contributions from the small pay of the privates, but never before has such a work been performed by the offerings of children, and one may well imagine that in very many cases there was something like a struggle in their minds whether the penny should be given towards the statue of a Queen or invested in the purchase of toffey, or some tempting piece of pastry. It speaks well for the future of thousands of these children that their pence have been applied towards the beautiful work, and in after years not a few of them will look with pride on the statue, and tell of their contribution, which, though small, was, perhaps, the larger proportion of the whole of their wealth. Two thousand scholars and teachers of the Sunday-schools were present at the inauguration of the statue, and several thousands of persons assembled on the occasion. The Mayor of Salford first briefly explained to his Royal Highness the purpose for which the statue had been erected. The covering was then removed from the marble, and there stood before him in flowing regal robes, with all the dignity of a Queen and the graces of womanhood, the Sovereign of the British people—one towards whom he felt not merely the allegiance of a loyal subject, but one who shared with him those warmer attachments which, alike in the palace as in the cottage, give their noblest charms to the gentlest ties of domestic life. The Prince appeared deeply interested in the proceedings, and, after examining the statue carefully for some moments, congratulated Mr. Noble, the sculptor, on its success as a work of art. Prince Albert, taking a final look at the statue, then left the ground, and, accompanied by his suite, once more crossed the Irwell, and, proceeding through Market street, arrived at the London-road station, where a special train was in readiness to convey him to London.

The statue and pedestal are of the finest Sicilian marble, altogether exceeding twenty feet in height, and weighing nearly thirty tons. Mr. Noble has designed and executed it in an admirable style and spirit, worthy of the occasion, and Peel Park has gained a beautiful, dignified, and characteristic likeness of England's beloved Queen. In our Journal for May 9 we gave a profile view of this statue.

LEICESTER AND HITCHIN RAILWAY.

THIS important branch of the Midland Railway, by which a new entrance to the metropolis for the traffic north of Leicester is secured, was opened for public traffic on the 6th inst.

The distance from Leicester to Hitchin, where this line joins the Great Northern Railway, is 66½ miles. It is a double line throughout, and passes through Market Harborough, Kettering, Wellingborough, Bedford, and many smaller agricultural towns and villages.

There are many important engineering works on the line. The Sharnbrook Viaduct is a very fine example of how strict economy and architectural effect may be combined. The viaduct over the Ouse at Bedford is a very graceful structure, all in iron, on the continuous girder principle.

There is only one tunnel, about half a mile in length, through the high ground near Southill, the seat of W. H. Whitbread, Esq.

Messrs. Liddell and Gordon are the engineers of the line, Mr. Brassey is the contractor.

The stations—one of which we give as an Illustration—are ornamental and picturesque. They are designed by Mr. C. H. Driver, one of Messrs. Liddell and Gordon's assistants, and have been built under the superintendence of Mr. Webber.

INTERIOR OF THE CENTRE FORT OFF MOHAMMERAH.

THE CAPTURE OF MOHAMMERAH.

THE force intended for the operations against Mohammerah having been previously dispatched, the squadron, under the command of Captain Young, sailed from Bushire on the morning of the 19th of March with Sir James Outram and the head-quarters staff on board. The rendezvous at the mouth of the Euphrates was reached on the evening of the 21st. Two days were spent in completing arrangements, and on the 24th the whole armament moved up the Shat-el-Arab mouth of the river, and anchored about three miles below the point where the Karoon, running from east to west, joins the Euphrates. At that point, which is about two miles below the town of Mohammerah, the Persians had erected two batteries—one on the northern (or right), the other on the southern (or left), bank of the Karoon. Though armed with only 12-pounder and 9-pounder guns, these batteries were very strong—the earthworks being about 18 ft. thick at the base, and 10 ft. at the top, and 18 ft. high. They were so placed as, in Sir James's words, "to sweep the whole stream to the extent of the range of the guns up and down the river, and across to the opposite shore." Further up the Karoon also, on the north bank, was a smaller earthwork mounting three guns, placed not less skilfully than the others. The enemy's force was distributed in three camps on the north and west sides of Mohammerah, one of them resting upon the river. Prince Khanler Mirza held the supreme command, and mustered round his colours, as is supposed, 13,000 men, with thirty guns. Preparations for the attack on this formidable position commenced on the night of the 24th, opposite to the northern battery, at about 800 yards distance. In the main stream of the Euphrates was a long low strip of muddy land called Dhubba Island. Upon this island it had been proposed to erect a mortar battery; but, after a careful reconnoitring of the ground during the night of the 24th, it was found necessary to abandon the scheme on account of the depth of the mud, and to substitute for it a floating battery, to be moored on the side of the island furthest from the enemy's battery. A raft was accordingly prepared with all possible rapidity, under the superintendence of Commander Rennie, of the Feroze, and, being armed with two 8-inch and two 5½-inch mortars, was towed to its position by a small steamer on the night of the 25th. By this time all had been arranged for an attack the following morning. The vessels of war were to move up at daybreak, and engage the batteries in connection with the mortar raft. When the enemy's fire was silenced, or nearly so, the troops (which had been all transhipped from the large transports to the smaller ships and steamers) were to be taken up and landed above the northern battery, thus taking the camps and the town of Mohammerah in the rear.

At daylight on the 26th the mortars on the raft opened fire, and were immediately replied to from the enemy's batteries. At half-past six the steamers got under way, the Semiramis, with the Clive sloop of war in tow, leading; then the Ajdaha, the Feroze, the Assaye, and the Victoria, towing the Falkland sloop. By seven all were hotly engaged with the batteries. The Persian fire was heavy and well sustained, but gave way gradually under the overwhelming weight of the broadsides from the ships, delivered, as in some cases they were, at less than point-blank distance, and consisting of 8-inch shot and shell, and 32 and 24 pounders. In spite of the strength of the enemy's earthworks they crumbled to powder under the storm, and gun after gun ceased firing, till, after three-quarters of an hour, three or four only of their pieces were at work. Then Commodore Young, thinking the path sufficiently clear, hoisted the signal agreed upon for the advance of the light vessels containing the troops. Some little delay occurred at this point, but by half-past nine o'clock the flotilla got under way, and moved up towards the scene of action. As they drew near a gun from the south bank of the Karoon opened upon the vessels in succession, striking the Berenice several times, and killing a man on board the Scindian. Just before they came up with the ships of war some heavy explosions had taken place in the enemy's batteries, which thereupon finally ceased firing, though from their ruins a smart discharge of musketry was opened and maintained till storming parties from the ships were landed. The troop-vessels were at once pushed up past the now silent northern battery to the place of disembarkation. This was found to be admirably suited for the purpose. There was water enough close alongside to float the largest of the transports. One (the Golden Eel) did no right alongside and actually sang her bowsprit on to the bank from her deck. The Bermuda steamer landed all her men on the 75th Highlanders—by means of a plank.

Before two o'clock p.m. all the force was on shore, and formed for an advance upon the enemy's camp with the exception of a squadron of Sind Horse, which had not been able to land in time, and the troop of Horse Artillery, which had got on the wrong side of the [illegible] and had to wait for the construction of a bridge. There was, however, a troop of horse which moved forward, and a field battery, the 64th and 78th, the 20th and 26th Native Infantry, and the Light Battalion. Marching across a fine open plain, the army soon came in sight of the Persian camps, but not for some time was the enemy to be seen. Advancing at a quick pace, the [illegible] their character in the most evident that the enemy had run. And so it proved. The camps were entered, and were found to be deserted. They had been hastily abandoned, the tents all standing, and great quantities of flour and grain and other stores remained, to ease the pressure upon the commissariat of the conquerors. The English General was too weak in cavalry to attempt any serious operation upon the retreating enemy, but he detached Captain Green with a party of Sind horse, by whom their rear guard was seen retiring in apparently good order, though the road they had traversed was strewn with arms and accoutrements.

The loss sustained by the ships of the Indian navy in this successful and most creditable achievement was very slight, amounting to five or six killed and about twenty wounded. Among the latter was Lieut. H[illegible]s, of the Semiramis, but not seriously. Much of the immunity enjoyed was probably due to the wise precaution of placing trusses of horned hay round and upon the bulwarks of the ships as a protection to the seamen at the guns on the upper deck. The loss of the enemy is estimated roughly at 200—mostly caused by the heavy shot in the [illegible], where the destruction was complete and terrible. Sixteen guns (one a fine Russian 12-pounder) and one mortar were captured, and a number of tents and many stores of various kinds.

We are indebted for the accompanying Sketches of the interior of two of the Forts to a Midshipman of the Hon. East India Company's corvette, Falkland.

MUTINY OF NATIVE TROOPS IN INDIA.

The Bengal papers are filled with the particulars of the mutiny of the 19th Regiment Native Infantry, which has ended in the disbandment of that corps, and the spread of disaffection to the 34th Regiment Native Infantry. The original pretence of the mutineers was that they were supplied with cartridges in the manufacture of which some animal impurity was used that it would defile a Brahmin to touch. The fact turns out to be that it is the old story of a demand for an increase of pay.

A Calcutta correspondent gives the following graphic account of the disbandment of the disaffected regiment:—

The 19th Regiment Native Infantry has been disbanded. The Government ordered it to the Barrackpore, the metropolitan cantonment, in order that the punishment might be inflicted in the presence of the disaffected. Meanwhile every precaution was adopted to prevent the possibility of resistance. It was known that the 34th were in league with the 19th. It was suspected that the 2nd Grenadiers, if not positively disaffected, were cognisant of the plans, and sympathised with the mutinous regiment. The two remaining native corps of the brigade were believed to be faithful, but it is never easy to predict what natives will do when a temptation is placed suddenly before them. It was, therefore, necessary to provide against an outbreak of five thousand armed men stationed only sixteen miles from a defenceless capital in a country where two soldiers can disperse a mob of a Majesty's with was hastily brought up from Burmah. A wing of her Majesty's 53rd was ordered to Barrackpore. The native body guard cavalry, 500 strong, were dispatched in the night, and two troops of artillery, with twelve pieces of cannon, were brought from Dumdum into the cantonment. Private orders were issued to the magistrates to place large bodies of the police upon the bridges which lead into the town. Private orders were issued to Major-General Hearsey, authorising him to employ European men if he were necessary to crush the whole force at his disposal, and to hamper these regiments. The Europeans were received with a sort of anxious misgiving as to the result, such as Anglo-Indians can alone display and amused themselves by circulating the most preposterous rumours. These measures were complete on March 30. Meanwhile a number of circumstances increased the prevailing uneasiness. The Colonel commanding at Dumdum received what appeared to be trustworthy intelligence that the 19th were marching upon the station to seize the artillery. Dumdum is eight miles from Calcutta. He had only forty men, but he called them together, prepared for defence, and ordered all officers' families to quit the station. They objected, and at two o'clock at night some dozen frightened women were besieging the houses of their friends in Calcutta for rest and shelter. The same afternoon Lieutenant Baugh, Adjutant of the 34th Native Infantry, was attacked by a drunken or drugged sepoy at Barrackpore. He was severely wounded, but the guard refused to arrest the assassin, and the man strutted up and down [illegible] Major-General himself. The fraternisation between the two regiments were resolved to offer that yield on the following morning. Dr. Burgess was invited and accepted the parade. By the arrangements the artillery and cavalry occupied one side, the native regiments the other and the 53rd Native Infantry, which had been halted for the night outside the station, marched into the midst. The Major-General then read aloud the order.

Up to the last moment it was doubtful whether the men would submit, or whether a yell of defiance would compel General Hearsey to open fire. They asked permission to petition. The time, they were told, had passed, and they must go down their arms. The preparations cowed the men. The old instinctive terror of the European has not passed away, and they had down their arms. The native officers actually wept with grief and rage. No humiliation was withheld them, and they were allowed to retain their uniforms, and were then escorted by the cavalry to Chinsurah. There they are gradually dispersing to their homes.

It was hoped that this example would have had a pacific effect. It has certainly crushed the mutiny but the 34th are more mischievous than ever. The man who attempted to assassinate Lieutenant Baugh was condemned to death, but no disposition was the temper of to men that General Hearsey could not venture to trust them and the sentence was carried out under the protection of shotted guns and two European regiments. It can be necessary to mention that this General is their highly able Quartermaster-General for the Hindostanee scholars in his rank, and, generally speaking, beloved by the sepoys.

I fear the 34th also must be disbanded. Meanwhile the native regiment at Dinapore is only kept in check by the presence of her Majesty's 84th. The coward spirit of the Lushais and Sonthals relies have complain that they should be compelled to use the cartridge, and his Commander-in-Chief's own escort have excommunicated their comrades for touching them. Almost all the regiments of the line sympathise more or less; but, strange to say, all the irregulars, all the Sikhs, the Goorkas, and all the cavalry ridicule the movement. The Sikhs in the ranks of their chiefs threaten some more serious, is very important. I think, as a matter of opinion, that it must end in blood, disarming, but I have no fear of a general revolt. One source of danger is the extreme exasperation of the Europeans. A mutiny doubles their duties, and it is not always quite easy to hold them in.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL ADAMS.—A small but very graceful spire has been erected in the course of the last year in the parish church of Wem, Salop, to the memory of the late Major-General Henry William Adams, C.B., by his widow. The elegant structure, which has been designed by Mr. G. Gilbert Scott, and ably carried out by Messrs. Bridgeman, of Coventry, stands at the west end of the nave, and is in the early Perpendicular style. Over the entrance, within a richly decorated niche, stands the figure of a knight in armour, and on the summit of the buttresses on each side of the porch, are figures representing Fortitude and Prudence, qualities essential to the character of a Christian warrior. Within the porch over the entrance door of the church is the following inscription, carved in stone:—"This spire is erected to the glory of God and in Memory of Major-General Henry William Adams, of Aston Hall, Companion of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, who died at Sultanpore the 24th of December, 1857, of wounds received in the Battle of Inkerman. Aged 49 years. Though He slay me yet will I trust in Him. Job xiii. 15."

On the 19th instant her Majesty's steamer Hornet, Captain Forsyth, while cruising off St John's Island fell in with a fleet of piratical junks. The steamer could not be brought within range of them, owing to their not being sufficient draught of water in the bay where they were. The boats of the steamer pulled in, and Captain Forsyth, observing the position of the junks was a strong one, landed with a party of marines, and reached an eminence, whence, as well as from the boats an effectual fire was kept up on the junks. After a good deal of firing the pirates took to the hills and seventeen of their boats were taken possession of, and subsequently destroyed. The only accident that occurred was one man of the Hornet severely burned by a stinkpot. On board one of the junks were found one European and a Goa Portuguese, they said they had been pressed by the pirates.

EXHIBITION OF THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

(THIRD NOTICE.)

MR. WALLIS contributes nothing of such enchaining interest, or so exquisite in execution, as his "Death of Chatterton" exhibited last year; but his present works show more various powers. In No. 501 Montaigne is represented seated in the library of his château in Perigord, relating to the fanatical young lady from Gournay, who travelled the whole of France bearing all the dangers of War, to throw herself with Platonic admiration at the feet of her oracle. The expression of Montaigne is not successful. With a pretty woman kneeling in adoration, there should be a touch of French gallantry, or, at least, his features should be relaxed with a smile; but he sits as grim as a Puritan and as hard learned as ever. His habits of what the Germans would call subjective philosophical contemplation it may have been the aim of the artist to represent or to hint at his calm courage; but this is not the French Horace with all his ingenuous vanity, his humorous perception, and bonhomie. M. Michelet also might well consider Mademoiselle as pas ridicule, but we find her in the picture as pas stupide. The shadows on the face of Montaigne are stippled with very unpleasant hues. Nevertheless the effect of the light pouring in from the open window, all the accessories, especially the textures and tapestry, the convex mirror reflecting the two other windows of the round tower, the clock, books, &c., are very cleverly painted. All the fitments and the Greek and Latin quotations inscribed in every direction (so characteristic of Montaigne) prove as that the studies were made, as Mr. Wallis tells us, in the room itself. "A Sculptor's Workshop, Stratford-on-Avon, A.D. 1617" (458), represents a long-faced, red-haired sculptor just completing the Stratford bust of Shakspeare; and Ben Jonson, with his wart, and in his best dress, pointing out—partly from the posthumous casts he holds in his hand, and partly from affectionate recollection—some little discrepancy in the sculptor's work. Three or four children are playing about, and a model of the monument which surrounds the bust is on the floor. The church is seen through the window; and the Avon, with of course some swans, flows gently between. In this picture the light and shade is again seen to be Mr. Wallis's forte. In respect to the authority for the posthumous cast Chantrey was of opinion that in the Stratford bust there was sufficient internal evidence alone, as for instance in the dissimilarity of the two sides of the face, to prove that such a cast was taken.

Mr. Philip paints with remarkable full-pencilled firmness, richness of colour, and strength of effect. His composition, also, renders the incident represented always simple and direct in meaning. In "The Prison Window, Sevilla, 1857" (225), a prisoner is seen, forgetful of his precious situation, eagerly forcing his face through the prison bars to kiss his child, which the grief-stricken, anxious mother holds up for his rough embrace. Her love and anguish are finely expressed in her weeping and drooping eyes, as she kisses one of the great hands and fondles the other. A poor old woman in the distance is apparently pleading the cause of, we suppose, her son with great simplicity and many tears to the sentinel on duty, whose attention, however, is completely absorbed in the delicate operation of properly lighting his cigaro. "Charity" (448) is a most capital study, not merely of a Spanish priest in his shovel hat and red umbrella, but of human nature. A poor woman, with a child at her breast, holds out her hand immediately before a sleek, well-fed priest, but he is utterly unconscious of her presence—his thoughts, of course, raised above earthly things. The self-satisfied, self-righteous, hypocritical smirk of benignity assumed evidently habitually by this miserable pharisee is given with admirable power.

Mr. Ansdell, like Mr. Philip, has greatly benefited his painting by turning his attention from Scotland to Spain. The mules of Spain are the finest in the world, and Mr. Ansdell has caught the wicked sagacity of their dark eyes as that they are engaged drinking, in No. 356, very felicitously. The dusky effect of the animals and figures against the deep blue sky, in "Ploughing—Sevilla, 1857" (597), is very fine. Mr. Ansdell may well add the date to this picture, for we should else have scarcely suspected that, even in Spain, such primitive methods of agriculture still existed. But what a picturesque land it is, and of the [illegible]man. The face of the old "Water Carrier" (331), whom the eternal cigarito is full of dry humour, though the pretty girl at the fountain will plainly have a thing to say to him.

Mr. Le Jeune has been less successful. His refined treatment and exquisite painting of the "Young Duchess" (1), and the pearly, cold pallor of the Queen's face with the chill dampness of death beginning to settle on the brow and round the attenuated nostrils, the sad sweet breaking from the quivering, bloodless lips, and the eye, which yet seems to say that, even in this last hour, the slight prominence of the cornea showing through the thin eyelids are deep touches of the nightman. The face of the old "Water Carrier" (331), whom the eternal cigarito is full of dry humour, though,

NOTES.

RARE EDITIONS OF SHAKSPEARE.—The sale this week by Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson, of "A singularly curious and important collection of Shakspearean literature, recals to my mind some notes not without interest, which I extracted from the copy of the folio 1623, now in the British Museum, 644, m. 1. This copy formerly belonged to Steevens, and has his autograph, "G Steevens," on the dedication page. Upon the back of the page, containing Ben Jonson's verses, is written

"Shake-speare, fol. 1623, G. Steevens, ex dono Jacobi Tonson Bibliop. 1765 It had cost Mr Theobald. From him it devolved to Dr. Johnson, who did not much improve its condition A copy of the same book, bound in red morocco, was purchased at the sale of Mr John Watson Reed, March 2, 1790 for thirty five pounds fourteen shillings by the Duke of Roxburgh. Another copy in the course of the same month was sold by Messrs. White, books-ellers in Fleet-street, for £.5, to Lord Spencer.

On the fly-leaf of this folio is pasted part of the sale catalogue of the books of "John Watson Read, Esq., F.S.A., late of Ely-place, deceased, sold by auction by J. Egerton, bookseller at the room in Scotland-yard, on Monday, March 1, 1790, and following day." The prices obtained for the quartos contrast oddly enough with their value at the present day:—

From another copy of the 1623 folio, formerly belonging to Sir R. Comyns, and sold by Sotheby and Co, March 31, 1856, I copied the following note:

That the printer intended to produce a correct work is proved by my friend Mr. Halliwell's copy. Page 193 was cancelled because it had been numbered 203; and 304 was corrected because Ori had been printed instead of Clo., and Clo instead of Will. He has the faulty leaves. "Hamlet," p. 278, has ten errors, corrected in other copies. This page he supposes to be an uncorrected proof.

TOBACCO NOTE.—LONGEVITY OF QUAKERS.—I find from a registry of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, "that, as a consequence of their abstaining from tobacco, one-half that are born live to the age of forty-seven years; whereas Dr. Price tells us that, of the general population of London, half that are born live only to two years and three-quarters. Among the Quakers one in ten arrive at eighty years of age, of the general population of London only one in forty." Never did a more powerful argument support the late verdict of the Lancet. J. B. N.

SHAKSPEARE AND ARISTOTLE.—To rescue Bacon and Shakspeare from an alleged misrepresentation of Aristotle, "C. C. H., Oxon," suggests that when Aristotle uses the word ἠθικὸν (politics) he means ἦθος (morals); but Aristotle was one of the last of men to have such confused ideas or to be guilty of such confusion of terms. He has left to our times three distinct treatises on morals (all the Romanic nations so translate ἦθος), and a separate one on politics, wherein he has carefully discriminated the distinct objects of each art, and has illustrated their etymology. Dr. Hampden has added the weight of his name to Bacon and Shakspeare (Moral Phil., Lect. vii., p. 227), but has failed to indicate his authority, although otherwise minute in such references. Aristotle, instead of saying "that young men are no fit auditors of moral philosophy," proves on the contrary that early youth is the fittest time for hearing (learning) ethics; and says that almost everything nay, everything (πάντων μᾶλλον δὲ τὸ πάθ) depends on early culture (ἐθῶς ἐκ νέων εὐθ(ξεσθαι). He proposes to make morals (otherwise virtue) habitual in youth (Nicom. Ld., Mag. i. 6, End ii. 2). In practice all civilised people follow the same course, in the hope that a habit of virtue may aid in resisting the assaults of vice in riper age Young men from college are made teachers of morals, and their fitness is not denied; but before they become teachers they must have been learners (learners). On the other hand, what Aristotle says of politics (Nicom. Eth. i. 1, Pol. iii. 1, vii. 9) is equally true; for we do not make statesmen of boys and college attendants, but find great difficulty in selecting competent men. I imagine much as not only an immense quantity of book-learning must be acquired to be used promptly, but a large experience of the world is necessary, as well as the tact which enables a man to bend the conflicting and vacillating opinions of many towards one point of combined political action. ### QUERIES.

CLERICAL MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.—In what year was the Act passed excluding the clergy from Parliament?—D. D.

[The 41 George III., c. 73.]

CLERGYMEN FIRST STYLED REVEREND.—Will any of your correspondents inform me when "Reverend" was first applied to a clergyman? D. D.

THE LAST SLAVE SALE IN ENGLAND.—I shall be obliged if any of your numerous readers will give me the date of the last public sale of a slave in this country. UNCLE TOM.

ETYMOLOGY.—I have not as yet seen any satisfactory derivation of the verb "to cree," which signifies "to seethe;" also "to pound," "to bruise." To say that it is derived from the Gaelic "cri" (the heart) is surely ridiculous. What is the heart to do with seething or pounding? When we say that one word is akin to, or derived from another, we must in all conscience take care that the words bear some decent resemblance to each other, not only in sound but in sense. It is just possible that the verb "to cree" may be of Scandinavian origin. But the word cree, according to Halliwell, is used in the northern counties of England as a substantive, denoting "a hut" or "sty, and it has the same signification in the lowlands of Scotland. This meaning of the word is decidedly from the Gaelic "crù" or "cro," which signifies a small hut or sty. In Lowland Scotch it is written croo," the co being sounded like the French u, which is nearly ee. Now, one is curious to know how the word has found its way so far to the south; the probability is that it came to Scandinavia from the Manks, and from Dumfriesshire, where Gaelic was once spoken, as is evident from many names of places in that corner of Scotland. D. FORBES.

ORTHOGRAPHY.—A friend of mine recently published a book of travels in Persia, and in the course of the work he had occasion to use such terms as "civilize," "Christianize," "Romanize,' &c. Well, the manager of the printing-office took upon themselves, without the author's leave, to spell all such words as the above with an s, instead of a z. That the s is the correct mode I have no doubt; but then much is to be conceded to custom, as Horace said, or sung, nearly 2000 years ago. Among your readers there are many who have made the orthography of our language part of their study, and I should like to see these come forward and settle this quæstio vexata. I take it that the confusion I here complain of has arisen from the simple fact that since the letter s between two vowels is very frequently sounded like z, therefore it may displace the latter altogether. This, however, is a vulgar error, not a bit better than it would be to write "physic" thus fizik. I have several other queries of this kind, but I must not at present trespass too much on your time and space. D. FORBES.

ANSWERS.

THE GAME OF CRICKET.—A correspondent of years long since inquired concerning the origin of this game. I have always believed the game to be of comparatively modern invention, and was surprised to find, the other day, in Florio's "Worlde of Wordes," 1598, the Italian phrase, Fare fri fri, interpreted to play cricket a wicket. This probably alludes to something very different to our English sport; but the combination of words is curious, and, perhaps, worth a note in "Memorabilia."—LILLY WHITE.

| WHITE (Mr. S. & Mr. B.) | BLACK (Mr. L. & Mr. O.) | WHITE (Mr. S. & Mr. B.) | BLACK (Mr. L. & Mr. O.) |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1. P to K 4th | P to K 4th | 17. Q to Q Kt 6th (ch) | K to K sq |

| 10. Q to Q Kt 3rd | Q to K 2nd | 26. Q Kt K Kt (ch) | K to Kt 2nd |
| 11. Q Kt to Q R 3rd | P to Q R 4th | 27. P to Q 5th | Kt to Q sq |
| 12. Q B to K B 4th (b) | P to Q Kt 4th | 28. Q to K 8th (ch) | Kt to K B 2nd |
| 13. Q K takes P | P takes Kt | 29. Q to K 6th (ch) | K to Kt 3rd |
| 14. Q takes P (ch) (c) | K to Q sq (d) | 30. R takes Kt | R takes R |
| 15. K B to Q 6th | Q to Q R 2nd | 31. Q takes R | |
| 16. B takes Q R | Q takes B | And Black shortly surrendered. | |

(a) White might also have played Q to Q Kt 3rd, in which case the game would probably have been carried on thus:

|---|---|---|---|
| 6. Q to Q Kt 3rd | Q to K 2nd | 9. K to B 2nd | K B to K 3rd |
| 7. Q to Q Kt 5th (ch) | P to Q B 3rd | 10. P to Q 3rd | |
| 8. Q takes K Kt P | Q takes K P (ch) | And the game is equal | |

(b) A move which will be found an indispensable preliminary to the plan of action White contemplate pursuing.

(c) The sacrifice of the Kt, if Black advanced their Q Kt P, was resolved on: but it could not have been hazarded before the Q B was stationed at h 3 4th. At the present moment Black has apparently a still better move than taking the P with their Q, which is to play K B to Q 5th. In reality, however, that move is not so good as the one in the text, ex gr:

|---|---|
| 14. K B to Q 4th | Q R to his 3rd |
| 15. Q takes Q Kt P (ch) | Q Kt to Q 2nd |
| 16. Kt to K 3 5th | Q to K 5 sq |

And, although terribly cramped, Black retain the game by some wise move, and may in time accumulate out of their difficulties

(d) K to K B sq was thought by some to be the best move, but is that, and every other case, White's attack would still have proved irresistible. If Black had interposed their Q R, White would have returned with Q to Kt 7th, if Queen had interposed their Q Kt, then would have followed, with fatal force, Kt to K B 5th; and lastly, if they had covered with their Queen, the following variation shows White must have got a great advantage. Suppose—

|---|---|
| 14. | Q to Q 2nd |
| 15. Kt to K B 5th | Q takes Q |
| 16. B takes Q (ch), | and, 17. Q to K B 6th (ch), |

And White regain a Piece for the one sacrificed and have a winning superiority in position

(e) Equally good, perhaps better, would have been—25. Q K takes K Kt; 26. B to Q 6th (ch), 27. Q to K B 6th (ch), and, 28. B takes Kt, &c.

FRENCH FINANCIAL AFFAIRS.

THE financial condition of France offers matter at this moment for serious reflection. A storm has been sown, and there is a whirlwind to be reaped. The harvest is almost ready; and Panic, with his sickle in his hand, is about to mow down the unwholesome fortunes that have sprung up on the fat soil of the Bourse, and to cumber the earth with the dead stalks and rotten leaves of speculation. The portents are too many to be disregarded, and all the world can see them except the French

It has been the policy of the Emperor to direct the intelligence and the energies of the Parisians out of the field of politics into that of trade. He has given them > permission to barter,

> To labour, to plod, and to thrive,
> To gamble, to cheat, to adventure,
> To sing, and to dance, and to wive;

but he has forbidden them the exercise of their faculties in those constitutional struggles which are the life of a free people. He has taken upon himself the entire charge of the State and of the Government; and has left to the most able, the most enterprising, and the most active-minded of his subjects no object for which to strive except Money. Literature is either defunct or is prostituted to the service of Absolutism. The press is silent, except to puff speculation, or to retail the purchased praises of a system of government which tolerates no opinion except that which emanates from the head of the State. In Germany the intelligence that was forbidden to employ itself on questions of State policy took refuge in Theology and Metaphysics. In France—where Theology is not popular, and where Metaphysics are considered too dull and bête—intelligence, having no other vent, has found refuge in commercial gambling. A fury of speculation has taken possession of the popular mind; and, as in England during the Railway Mania of 1845-46—only with an intensity fifty times greater—the only thought of the middle and upper classes is to grow rapidly rich upon premiums. The system is felt to be rotten, but who cares? Each thinks of himself alone; and, provided he can make something in the scramble, before the crash comes, is content that his neighbour should be the victim. The blame of this state of things lies in the first instance upon the Emperor. It is his system which has produced the fever, and it is his system which must, sooner or later, suffer for it.

Those who have studied the history of the South Sea Bubble, of the Mississippi Scheme, and of the Railway Mania, are as well able to trace the causes, the progress, and the catastrophe of the present diseased state of the public mind in Paris, as a physician is to trace the origin and predict the progress of a bodily malady in an individual patient. The catastrophe is inevitable; and when it comes it will bring along with it not only the ruin of thousands of speculators, and hundreds of thousands of victims, but the trial, and possibly the collapse, of the system of government which produced it.

The Emperor, in his famous speech to the people of Bordeaux, declared that the "Empire was Peace." But he did not declare that Peace, to be permanent or ennobling, must be accompanied by honest and remunerative industry. Peace is the first requisite for a nation, but is not of itself sufficient to give it happiness. Under the régime of the Emperor, if there have been war abroad, there has been peace at home. Faction has been silenced; Insurrection has not dared to show its face; and Revolution, that grim ghost which has troubled the sleep of every Government that has existed in France for the last sixty-eight years, has been scared out of the streets by the presence of armed men, and by the grip of a strong hand and an indomitable will. But Agriculture, that mainstay of every nation, has not flourished. On the contrary, Agriculture has been neglected; and France, with a larger appetite and a larger family, has had less to eat than usual. Nothing has been done for the encouragement of Agriculture by a Government which undertook to do all things, and to regulate all things. Joint-stock companies, for all sorts of purposes, in and out of France, have been fostered; but no joint-stock companies for the reclamation and cultivation of waste lands—for the better cultivation of existing farms—or for the development of the great agricultural resources of the country, have been organised or even suggested. France has grown no more food, and produced no more wine, olives, and silk, under the Imperial reign, than she did in previous years. All trade and manufactures have been equally stagnant. The war against Russia—the burden of which, enormous as it was, scarcely affected the comfort, and in no degree whatever the credit, of Great Britain—pressed very severely upon the comforts of the French taxpayers, and would have brought down the credit of the nation with a woful collapse if it had continued for six months longer. During the last five years the real wealth of France—derivable from legitimate industry, from agriculture, from manufactures, and from commerce with other nations—has not increased; while the expenditure of the nation has been augmented in every possible shape. A locust-like army has eaten up the fruit of the land. Millions upon millions of public money have been wasted upon unremunerative works in the capital and its suburbs, and upon the restoration of ancient cathedrals in the towns and cities of the departments, in order that an army of masons and other working men might be employed at unnaturally high wages, and be thus conciliated in favour of a Government which, though it denied them their birthright of liberty, gave them an overflowing mess of pottage in return. To encourage the trade of a captious and high-spirited capital, and to keep its sordid shopkeepers in good humour, an example of luxury, in comparison with which all previous luxury known to the French was poor, tame, and commonplace, was set in the Tuileries. The middle and upper classes showed themselves apt scholars in the school of the vice and the sensuality which were inculcated upon them as equivalents for their lost liberty; and from the Count de Morny and the immediate attendants of the Emperor, to the Foulds, the Pereires, the Mirès, the Millauds, and other magnates of the Bourse, and from them again to the smaller fry of speculators, luxury and extravagance of a kind which are read of in the days of Heliogabalus, but which have been unknown since then, even in the extravagant and luxurious days of Louis XIV., have run riot in Paris. And all this evil has been accompanied by the most hazardous and mischievous expedients to keep the people quiet. When foolish laws, and the decay of agriculture, raised the price of food in Paris, food was bought at a high rate by the Government, and retailed at a low one. The bakers and butchers were compelled under penalty of fine or imprisonment to sell their commodities at a loss; and the Government, having no money but what it derived from the people themselves, made up the difference. All these, and many other causes of evil, have long been in operation. The results are successively declaring themselves; and at any moment a sudden breath may blow down the house of cards, and strew ruin not only among the knaves, but among the kings and queens of the pack.

France has gone through many dangers; but the great danger of her present position is, that she does not see how rotten is the foundation of her finance. When Englishmen go wild, as they sometimes do, in speculation, they know that they have only themselves to blame for the catastrophes which ensue, and breathe no vengeance against their Government. But in France it is the Government which has encouraged speculation, and which, by assuming to itself all power, all responsibility, and all direction, attracts to itself as the necessary consequence all the blame and all the retribution. We have no wish to be alarmists; but it is impossible not to see that a financial crisis is imminent among our neighbours; and the English people have too much respect and sympathy for the French, and are too closely united with them, to look upon such a crisis with indifference.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

King Maximilian of Bavaria, who made his entry into Paris from Fontainebleau on Sunday, is still enjoying the Court hospitalities. On Monday morning the King of Bavaria received at the Pavillon Marsan the members of the Bavarian Embassy, and all the Bavarians of distinction now in Paris. At about one o'clock his Majesty entered one of the Court carriages, and paid visits to Prince Jerome, Prince Napoleon, and the Princess Mathilde. On Tuesday evening the King, in company with their Majesties, was present at an extraordinary representation at the Grand Opera. A deputation of the Municipal Council of Paris, headed by the Prefect of the Seine, had also the honour of being received by his Majesty, who accepted the invitation to be present at the ball to be given in his honour at the Hôtel de Ville on Thursday. The King afterwards took a drive on the Boulevards and along the quays.

The French Government has received despatches from M. Cochet, French Consul at Zanzibar. It appears that the difficulty respecting the accession to the throne of Muscat has been arranged.

It is said that, in consequence of the intervention of the French Ambassador at Constantinople, the Moldavian and Wallachian refugees, who had been stopped at Rustchuk, have been permitted to return to their native country.

The trial of forty-four individuals (thirty-five of whom are in custody) commenced on Wednesday before the Court of Correctional Police. They are accused of having formed part of a secret society, called the Francs Juges.

M. de Parieu, Vice-President of the Senate, is spoken of as the most likely person to succeed Count d'Argout as Governor of the Bank of France.

It is said that a Commission, formed in Paris, will be sent to the Danubian Provinces, with the object of examining all that relates to their agriculture, commerce, industry, topography, and military capabilities.

THE NEUFCHATEL AFFAIR.

The Moniteur of Tuesday contains the following announcement on this subject:—"The Plenipotentiaries of France, Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, Russia, and Switzerland, met to-day at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and signed a treaty which regulates in a definite manner the question of Neufchâtel, by the renunciation on the part of the King of Prussia of the sovereign rights which the treaties attributed to him over that principality, and by means of engagements entered into by the Swiss Confederation of a nature to respond to the deep solicitude of the King for the Neufchâtelese. The text of the treaty will be published after the exchange of ratifications, which will take place in not less than twenty-one days."

SPAIN.

Prince Galitzin, the Russian Ambassador, has presented her Majesty Queen Isabella II. with the insignia of the Orders of St. Catherine and St. Andrew.

The prolonged dissensions in the Senate, and the bad blood they generate, are looked upon with satisfaction by the Liberal party, who see an increase of their own strength in the division of their enemies, and with uneasiness by the Palace, which would fain witness the consolidation of a ultra-Conservative Ministry, and will certainly not have recourse to O'Donnell save at the last extremity. The Bravo-Murillo party is strong in the Congress, and there are reports of its intended opposition to Government, and of probable important debates in the Lower Chamber. It was hoped that the opening of the Chambers would clear up the situation a little; but as yet—and they have now sat for three weeks—it seems but to have rendered confusion worse confounded. The Congress has done literally nothing, and the whole time of the Senate has been wasted in tedious formalities and undignified squabbles.

SARDINIA.

King Victor Emmanuel and the Empress Dowager of Russia were present on Sunday at a grand concert given in the Theatre Royal, which was magnificently illuminated. On Monday morning the Empress took her departure for Switzerland by Mont Cenis. The King of Sardinia and the Prince de Carignan accompanied her Majesty to Susa.

At its sitting on the 18th the Sardinian Senate passed a bill for a railway between Geneva and Annecy, and others for the establishment of three new chairs in the University of Turin, the suppression of the salt monopoly in Sardinia, and the construction of an aqueduct from the valley of the Sangone to Turin.

An international telegraphic Congress is now sitting at Turin. France, Spain, Belgium, and Switzerland have sent representatives there. Two or three sittings have already been held. The Congress has as yet been chiefly occupied discussing the transmission of telegraphic despatches in cipher. The result of their deliberations has not yet been made public.

The Sardinian Minister of War has presented a report for the reorganisation of the Military College of Racconigi. A radical reform of all the military academies of Sardinia is under consideration.

PRUSSIA AND TURKEY.

An Ambassador Extraordinary from the Sultan arrived at Berlin on Tuesday to present to the King the insignia of the Order of Nischan Iftichar.

THE CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

By the ship Sutlej, which arrived on Monday, we have Cape Town papers to the 28th of March. The Governor had thought it better to prolong his stay on the eastern frontier, on account of the unsettled state of affairs and the doubtful disposition of the Kaffirs; he had, therefore, again prorogued the Parliament to April the 7th. His Excellency was transporting into the interior Kaffirs convicted either of stealing cattle or of prowling in the colony without passes.

By the Robert Lowe, which arrived on Tuesday, with news of a week's later date, we learn that confidence was completely re-established on the Cape frontier through the energetic measures adopted by the Governor.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.—INDIA AND CHINA.

The following telegraphic despatch from Trieste is in anticipation of the Overland Mail:—

"TRIESTE, May 28.

"The steamer America arrived here this morning at 8.30 a.m., in 116 hours from Alexandria, which port she left on the 23rd May. The India mails left Alexandria on that day, with advices from Bombay to 2nd May; Calcutta, 23rd April; Madras, 25th April; Ceylon, 3rd May; Hong-Kong, 15th April; and Shanghai, 6th April.

"The news of the conclusion of peace with Persia reached the camp at Mohammersh on the 5th of April.

"The Jemadar of the 34th Bengal Native Infantry, the ringleader in the late disturbances, has been hanged.

"Yusf Alí has been killed in an attack made upon his band to avenge the murder of M. Boileau.

"Meetings have been held at Singapore to congratulate Sir James Brooke on his just severity.

"The position of affairs in Canton river remains unchanged.

"Great distress is said to prevail at Canton from the high price of rice.

"The Raleigh, 50-gun frigate, had run aground. The Bittern had gone to receive her guns.

"It is asserted that an imperial duty on opium has been imposed at Shanghai."

The Moniteur de la Flotte publishes accounts from China of the 2nd of April, which pretend to contain some interesting details from the seat of war. According to this report, Yeh, the Viceroy of the southern provinces of the empire, is at present at Sou-Tche-Ting, a large village of Kouang-Tcheou, about fifteen miles from Canton. He has fortified himself in a good position, which allows him to maintain his communications with Pekin and with the other three provinces which, with the Kouang-Tcheou, form his viceroyalty, and which are the Kouang-Si, the Kouang-Toung, and the Konei-Lin. He is at present at the head of an army of 30,000 men, which he is increasing every day by means of forced levies and extraordinary taxes. A few days previously it became known at Hong-Kong that a British ensign, two non-commissioned officers, some soldiers, and a few seamen, who had been taken prisoners by surprise on various occasions, were at Yeh's head-quarters, where they were suffering great distress. It was resolved to open negotiations to obtain an exchange of prisoners in their favour, and a foreign agent, who had formerly had an interview with Yeh, undertook to manage the affair. Yeh consented to receive him, and, having listened to his propositions, he replied:—

You ask me to exchange the English I have in my possession, to the number of sixteen, against double the number of Chinese subjects, amongst whom are several Tartar officers, and one of the commanders of the Imperial junks. I refuse. I do not want your prisoners, and you may do as you please with them; but if you are desirous to have the sixteen Englishmen, and if you have the necessary means to treat for them, I will let you know my intentions to-morrow.

AMERICA.

By the screw steam-ship Kangaroo we have advices from New York to the 14th inst.

The George Law has arrived at New York with the Californian mails and 1,707,000 dols. on board.

The Golden Age, which arrived at Panama on the 4th, had upwards of 2,000,000 dols. on freight, of which 332,000 dols. were for England.

Advices from Havannah report that intelligence had reached that city of the retreat of General Walker from Nicaragua, and of his having taken refuge in a British man-of-war at San Juan del Sur.

A report was prevalent at Carson Valley to the effect that a serious dissension had arisen at Salt Lake City. It is said that Brigham Young had been compelled to fortify the city to save himself from the fury of his flock. The "difficulty" had its origin in matters relating to the administration of the church property.

Lord Napier had a long interview on the 7th inst. with the President, on the subject of the Dallas-Clarendon Treaty, which is said to have been of a very amicable and satisfactory character. At the Cabinet meeting on the same day the difficulties in New Granada were discussed at great length. It is rumoured that the Cabinet are quite unanimous on the necessity of adopting the most energetic measures for redress; and it is thought the Government intend to take early possession of the transit route. On the 8th inst. there was a Cabinet meeting, and it was reported that the recent rejection of the Dallas-Clarendon Treaty was under consideration. They believe that the statement of the British Government is correct as to Ruatan; but do not esteem it a sufficient reason for the rejection of the treaty.

The New York Herald of the 13th appears to regard the Central American dispute as menacing. It remarks:—

We dare say there will be no further negotiations with England upon Central American affairs till the meeting of the next Congress, and that then, instead of the reconsideration of the treaty of Dallas and Clarendon, we may anticipate the abrogation of the old Clayton-Bulwer Treaty and all its appendages.

In another place the Herald says:—

The satisfaction at the rejection of the Clarendon Treaty is evidently increasing. Despatches will go out to Mr. Dallas by to-morrow's steamer, informing him that no negotiation will be entertained at present by this Government. Lord Napier feels deeply the unpleasant position he has been placed in.

The city of New York is in a state of excitement relative to an act of the State Legislature depriving the council of that city of control over the police.

The three amendments to the Constitution of Massachusetts submitted to the people had been adopted by a decisive vote. The clause which requires that voters shall be able to read the Constitution in English, and write their own names, had 10,000 votes against it. The following are the amendments:—"1. That every voter shall be able to read the Constitution in the English language, and to write his own name. 2. Limits the House of Representatives to 240 members, to be elected by districts. 3. Provides for the choice of forty senators in single districts, instead of by counties as heretofore."

A private letter from an officer of the Rifles stationed at Fort Thorn, New Mexico, states that on the 11th of March Lieutenant Baker, with a detachment of thirty-five men of company B of that regiment, overtook a party of eighteen Apaches, and, after a sharp action, defeated them, and recovered forty-two horses which they had stolen from Senor Vigil.

SKETCHES IN PARLIAMENT.

LORD PALMERSTON—a great authority on such a subject—laid it down the other evening that it is very easy to make a joke of anything. The hilarity with which the House of Commons treated the question of the dotation of the Princess Royal is a notable exemplification of the axiom. Notwithstanding the prevalence of bald heads and grey hairs which is so remarkable in a young Parliament—a fact which the enormous Houses that have come together on several occasions lately have given ample opportunities of ascertaining—the mirthfulness which prevailed was almost boyish, inasmuch as the provocatives to laughter were of the slightest. Indeed, the readiness to drown speech in "much laughter" was suspicious of something behind, and one could not help fancying that there was something spasmodic in, those bursts of hilarity. Soldiers dying of ghastly wounds, and Atheists on their death-beds have uttered witticisms which deceived no one, and which but scantily concealed the tortures of the moribund; and, in truth, the House of Commons, having come down as a body to swallow whole, a pledge to their constituents, seemed determined to treat the matter with a sort of opium-eating vivacity. It is true that there were one or two Abdiels of the hustings who, at least for a moment, seemed to be among the faithful found. But it is to be feared that, if they were to be indicted for that political offence which in the United States is designated by the term "bunkum," they would stand self-convicted. No doubt Mr. Roebuck stood up boldly in the van of Opposition. His character for ill-temper and integrity entitled him to that distinction. But every one must have thought that he "did protest too much." Why his anticipatory speech on the motion for going into Committee? Why his accumulated expressions of loyal and affection to the Crown? Why his unpractical and impracticable amendment? And why his absence on the occasion of the second discussion of the subject, which brought down on him the censure of one or two of those Radical tritons among the minnows who were prepared to go in the most ridiculously small numbers into the lobby with him, and who were fain to follow the new member for Brighton, whose gasping timidity, when he essays to address the House, is exactly that of a young gentleman delivering for the first time before company that boy-famous speech in which Young Norval gives his name and address, and who is conscious that he has got up his declamation imperfectly? One word of tribute to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He saved a debate: he got the motion carried in an hour. Why, Sir Cornewall Lewis was put up to do this job is not very palpable, except that Lord Palmerston probably expected a discussion, and intended to reserve himself for a general reply—a needless precaution, as it turned out, for the House dragged the withdrawal of the amendment from Mr. Roebuck, and refused to allow the Premier the supererogatory "gilding of refined gold" at twenty minutes past seven o'clock; especially as Colonel French—doing his duty as Chairman of the Refreshment Committee—had set a whisper afloat that all the "entrées" which had been ordered for seven were solidifying in the hands of the chef de cuisine of the House. No one who reads that speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the newspapers but must be puzzled to know why it should be studded with "loud laughter," and "renewed laughter," from beginning to end. Few could comprehend why a solemn reference to Sir William Blackstone in an assembly of legislators, some hundred and fifty of them being jurists, should elicit a burst of spontaneous mirth. The clue is very simple, and it may be illustrated by saying that a short-hand note taken of any of Mr. Keeley's performances could as ill convey the stolidity, the unconsciousness of being absurd, and the deprecation of being laughed at, which are the characteristic accompaniments of the very simplest and most commonplace expressions of that ingenious performer. The manner in which the Finance Minister raised his head from the papers over which he was poring, and innocently inquired why there was any laughing, was a study for any professor of the histrionic art. He was thoroughly unconscious or unintentional of any looseness himself; but, far better, he was the cause of unlimited mirth in others, and he wafted a measure which carried with it many elements of shipwreck, on successive waves of laughter, right into port, where, perhaps, many a more skilful pilot would have stranded it.

The introduction of the Army Estimates presented Lord Palmerston in a very favourable attitude. It is well known that the Under Secretaryship for War has fallen into the hands of a very young man, and who has the misfortune to look a great deal younger even than he is, but who has given in his Parliamentary career great promise of future usefulness, and who is always received by the House with marked favour, for he never answers a question in his official capacity without getting a cheer. Indeed, it is not a little remarkable that a millionaire of twenty-five should at that early age separate himself from the pursuits of his time of life and take to business, and that in an office in which he must work. Some little curiosity was excited, therefore, with regard to the appearance of Sir John Ramsden as the mover of the Army Estimates; and there was some anxiety among his well-wishers when it was observed that early in the evening he was evidently very nervous, greatly occupied with numerous papers apparently not too well arranged, and constantly running to hold conversations with one of those grave functionaries who on estimate nights sit under the gallery, and perform the duties of prompters to their superiors who are displaying themselves on the floor of the House. Indeed, Sir John's tenacity of his despatch-box and his copy of the estimates was most devoted, for he went out in two divisions with at least one of those implements of his calling under his arm. Nothing could be more graceful and amiable than the manner in which Lord Palmerston presented himself to the House as the substitute for the Under Secretary for War. It put one in mind of one of those stories that they tell of the famous William Earl of Salisbury and Prince Arthur, when that gallant boy would put on his armour and rush into the fight for which his spirit alone fitted him. It was at once of the courage or the capacity or the skill of the youthful combatant which induced the tried and stalwart warrior to thrust himself before him, and give him only such opportunity of fleshing his maiden sword as his strength was equal to; and it was done in a manner which implied that but a short time and the young knight's spurs would be bravely won. It is only to be hoped that Sir Charles Burrell was present, for he is probably now the only member of the House who could institute a comparison between the manner of Lord Palmerston in moving the Army Estimates in 1809 and in 1857.

There must have been some curious speculation in the mind of that perpetual "intelligent foreigner" who is always supposed to be sitting in judgment on our institutions when he read the debates in the House of Lords this week. We, who, if not the most civilised, certainly claim to be the most moral people on earth, must have had false witness borne against us by those grave jurists, those learned prelates, and those experienced statesmen, who drew such pictures of our social life in their discussion of the subject of divorce. Is it really necessary to give elasticity to the law in order to afford loopholes of escape to such a hideous mass of broken vows, falsehood, fraud, collusion, lapses from virtue, cruelty to women, and every possible violation of a state which domestic England boasts to cherish and maintain as an institution with a purity in which she is before the whole world? For decency's sake, if not for very shame, it would have been well if the privilege of Parliament to close its doors to the public had been for this once exercised. To be sure, the strangers would have lost a very good entertainment and a very animated discussion. They could not have heard a Bishop famous among his order lay down that the precepts of Christianity were not necessarily the foundation of the civil laws of a Christian country; they would have missed the spectacle of a Peer innocent of hereditary eloquence trying to read a speech out of his hat, and of another madly eager to reply to an alleged libel upon him by his wife and a newspaper; they would have missed seeing a Lord Chancellor bending beneath the weight of his own measure, and twice leading his strong Government into the lobby in a minority; and they would have lost the astonishing exhibition of Lord Lyndhurst, at eighty-five, once more topping the whole assembly by the vigour of his intellect, the readiness of his conception, and the fertility of his mental resources.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord CAMPBELL presented a petition praying for some measure which should be suitable to the case of prisoners whose innocence might be established after conviction. At present they received a pardon, but the pardon did not reverse the sentence, and was, therefore, inadequate.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

On the order of the day for the House going into Committee on this bill.

The DUKE of NORFOLK moved, as an amendment, that the bill should be referred to a Select Committee for the purpose of taking evidence as to whether a warrant for admitting divorced persons to marry again could be found in the Holy Scriptures

After some discussion their Lordships divided, and the amendment was negatived by a majority of 123 to 26.

The House then went into Committee, and

Lord ST. LEONARDS proposed a clause, the object of which was to protect a married woman in the possession of her property and earnings from her husband and his creditors, should he have deserted her for twelve months.

The motion, which was opposed by the Government, was carried by a majority of 25 to 44.

Their Lordships were occupied during the remainder of the evening in the discussion of the clauses of the bill.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

On the motion of Sir G. GREY it was agreed that the House at its rising should adjourn until Thursday next.

In reply to a question from Mr. EWART, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he saw no objection during the present Session to abolish the Customs-duties upon over sixty articles of commerce which yield merely a nominal sum to the revenue.

ANNUITY AND MARRIAGE PORTION TO THE PRINCESS ROYAL.

On bringing up the report on the annuity to the Princess Royal,

Mr CONINGHAM moved an amendment to the effect that the annuity should be reduced from £8000 to £2000 per annum, which, with the £40,000, he thought an ample provision for her Royal Highness.

Lord PALMERSTON regretted that any attempt should be made to alter a vote which had been unanimously agreed to, and hoped the House would adhere to its former decision.

The House divided, and the amendment was negatived by a majority of 328 to 14.

On the report of the £40,000 marriage portion.

Mr. MAGUIRE moved as an amendment that the sum be not agreed to, being of opinion that the £9000 a year was an ample provision

Mr. CONINGHAM seconded the amendment

After some observations from Sir H WILLOUGHBY and Sir J. TRELAWNY, the House again divided, and the amendment was negatived by a majority of 261 to 18.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

On the order of the day for the House going into Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said that, although he had a considerable acquaintance with figures, he could not understand the accounts presented as Army Estimates; and he therefore moved that the said estimates be referred to a Select Committee

After some desultory discussion, the amendment was negatived without a division, and the House went into Committee

Lord PALMERSTON then explained at some length the Army Estimates, stating that, while providing efficiently for the service, the Government had kept a strict eye to economy. It was a maxim that the best manner of preserving peace was by being always prepared for war; and in this maxim he acquiesced, not to the extent that they should always keep up a large army, for that would be a ruinous measure of the country, and thus defeat the object in view, but so far as keeping in time of peace the nucleus by means of which a large and efficient army might be available in the event of war becoming inevitable. The noble Lord defended the estimates in which any increase appeared as compared with years before the late war, on the ground of the scientific improvements which had become necessary in consequence of the progress of the age, to maintain their army in an efficient state, whether as regarded its discipline or its equipments. He apologised for taking these explanations into his own hands; but he thought it as well to spare the inexperience of his hon. friend Sir J. Ramsden, who had been so short a time in office

Mr STAFFORD said the speech of the noble Lord gave him much gratification. He was strongly insisted that the army medical department was not sufficiently provided for

Mr. WATKIN said the House must feel indebted to the noble Lord for the comprehensive statement he had made in reference to these important estimates. He must say for himself—and he believed he might say the same for the gentlemen who sat near him, elected to support economy reform—that he accepted those estimates, upon the responsibility of the noble Lord While admitting the comprehensive nature of the noble Lord's statement, he could have wished to hear from him something more practical questions with regard to the construction of arms and military machinery Although an invasion was not at all likely, it of course was always possible. He would, therefore, call the attention of the Government to the expediency of constructing a coast telegraph; and, as regarded the conveyance of troops, he ventured to state that a full regiment of cavalry, with its stores, &c., could not be sent from any one of the railway termini under less than four hours' notice. He would call little attention to the subject would enable Government, in concert with the railway companies, to make the present rolling-stock of railways available for military purposes so that troops might be rapidly moved to any point of attack

Mr P. BARING, having adverted to the enormous expense of Aldershott, said that if the estimates should not be very much reduced next year the House would do well to refer them to a Select Committee

After a very desultory discussion relating to the various branches of the service the House proceeded to vote the estimates, which occupied until twelve o'clock

THE BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY (IRELAND) BILL.—On the order of the day for going into Committee on this bill, Mr. WHITESIDE objected to going on at midnight with a bill containing upwards of 330 clauses, many of them of great importance

The ATTORNEY-GENERAL for IRELAND persevered in going on, and the House divided, when the motion for going into Committee was carried by a majority of 121 to 67.

The House then went into Committee, but the Chairman immediately reported progress, on the motion of the Attorney-General for Ireland, without making progress with the clauses of the bill.

Lord PALMERSTON said that in its future progress the Government would itself take charge of the Ministers' Money (Ireland) Bill, and fixed the Committee upon it for Thursday next

The remaining business was then disposed of, and the House adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

SUNDAY-EVENING MEETINGS AT EXETER-HALL.

Viscount DUNGANNON put a question to the right rev. prelate opposite (the Bishop of London), with respect to statements which had appeared in certain newspapers, relative to a series of discourses being delivered at Exeter Hall on Sunday evenings during the summer months. He wished to know whether the accounts of those meetings were correct, whether the proceedings at them met with the sanction and approval of the right rev. prelate, and whether he considered them in conformity with the discipline and dignity of the Established Church.

The Bishop of LONDON did not know whether he was in order in answering that question (Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"). He believed there was no doubt such meetings had been held, as had been described, and it was the intention of those who promoted them that they should be continued for several Sundays. As he was not aware what the statements in the public papers were, it was impossible for him to say whether they were strictly in accordance with the facts. But he did believe that the requests which had been made to him that two prelates of the Church, two deans, and other should address the assembled people in Exeter Hall were strictly in accordance with an act which he held in his hand, namely, "An Act for Securing Freedom of Religious Worship" (Cheers). He believed such meetings not only legal, but in Exeter Hall, even to a degree expedient (Renewed cheering). There were thousands and thousands in this metropolis who had not entered a place of worship for several years and had been brought to these meetings, and not without decided benefit. Those who had been instrumental in establishing those meetings had the benefit of the laboring classes in this country at heart; and the reading of the public services and prayers of the Church would, he trusted, have the effect of making those classes, what at present they were not, habitual hearers of the word of God Loud cheers).

Lord KINNAIRD said he was on the platform at Exeter Hall, when upwards of 4000 persons were present, and his opinion was that those services would be productive of the greatest possible benefit.

The Bishop of Canterbury and Earl GREY rose amid loud cries of "Order!" which were continued till they resumed their seats, when

The Earl of HARDWICKE remarked on the inconvenience that would result from an answer to a question and prayer of the Church would, he trusted, have the effect of making those classes, what at present they were not, habitual hearers of the word of God Loud cheers).

The Archbishop of CANTERBURY did not think that the meetings alluded to were at all inconsistent with the dignity of the Established Church. It would be far more disparaging to that Church that she could not accommodate herself to the exigencies of the times.

The subject then dropped.

The Sale of Poisons, &c., Bill was read a second time.

The Transportation and Penal Servitude Bill was read a second time.

The Probates and Letters of Administration Bill was reported with amendments

Lord CAMPBELL presented a petition from the Duke of Norfolk against the claim of Earl Talbot to the Shrewsbury title and estates. On the motion of the noble and learned Lord the petition was referred to the Committee of Privileges

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

The House then went into Committee upon the above bill.

The Bishop of OXFORD moved the insertion of a clause at the end of Clause 43, the effect of which would be to protect from legal consequences any clergyman who should decline to remarry parties who had been divorced.

The Lord CHANCELLOR opposed the clause in question.

After some discussion their Lordships divided, when the numbers were for the Bishop of Oxford's clause.—Contents, 26; Non-contents, 78: majority against the clause, 52

The bill having gone through Committee, their Lordships adjourned until next Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

NEW WRITS. On the motion of Mr. HAYTER, new writs were ordered for the county of Kerry, in the room of Mr. H Herbert, who had accepted the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland; and for Reading, in the room of Mr. Keating, who had accepted the office of her Majesty's Solicitor-General

NATIONAL EDUCATION.—Sir J. PAKINGTON laid on the table the terms of the resolution he intended to move on the subject of education that day fortnight.

THE PRINCESS ROYAL'S ANNUITY BILL. Mr. BOWYER gave notice that in Committee on this bill he should move an amendment, to the effect that, in the event of the Princess becoming Queen of Prussia, the annuity should cease.

CENTRAL AMERICA.—Mr DISRAELI gave notice that he should on the next day, put a question to the First Minister with reference to the non-ratification of the Treaty with America with regard to Honduras.

JOINT-STOCK BANKS.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, in reply to Mr. Headlam, said that it was intended by the Board of Trade to introduce a bill during the Session to regulate the constitution of Joint-Stock Banks, but not with any reference to the principle of limited liability.

NEUFCHATEL QUESTION.—Lord PALMERSTON, in reply to Mr. Kinnaird, said the treaty proposed for the settlement of the Neufchâtel question had been accepted, both by Prussia and the Swiss Confederation, and signed a few days ago, so that the dispute might be considered to be satisfactorily settled (Hear, hear.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—BRAZIL

Mr. ROEBUCK called the attention of the House to the subject of our relations with Brazil, and moved for a Select Committee to take into consideration those relations, and to report thereupon. The hon and learned member, in supporting his motion, contended that the Brazilian Government had done all in its power to extinguish the slave trade, in accordance with the spirit of its treaties with this country; that the longer interference of our cruisers with Brazilian vessels was altogether unnecessary, while it was offensive to the dignity of the Brazilian Government, and detrimental to the interests of Brazilian commerce He therefore asked for a Committee in order that it might be ascertained whether it would not be wise to put our relations with that country upon a different footing, and upon a good understanding with a country with which we had such extensive commercial connections.

Mr B MOORE seconded the motion

Lord PALMERSTON opposed the motion, as being entirely uncalled for. He asserted that the cruisers of this country had done nothing more than was necessary to suppress the slave trade, and that the statements made by Mr. Roebuck with reference to our interference with Brazilian commerce were considerably exaggerated. He accused the gentleman of having yielded to vulgar and unfounded insinuations when he asserted that this country bullied the weak and succumbed to the powerful. In conclusion, he called upon the House to reject a motion the adoption of which would give encouragement to slave dealers, and tend to the extension of the slave trade in all directions (Cheers)

Mr. M. MILNES urged Mr Roebuck to withdraw his motion, not because there was no ground for inquiry, but because it would be quite useless to go to a division upon it.

Mr. ROEBUCK, in reply, charged Lord Palmerston with aiding and assisting the strong, such as the Governments of Spain and America, and bullying the weak, such as the Government of Brazil. He declined to withdraw his motion

Mr DISRAELI admitted the importance of the subject, and thought the House was much indebted to Mr Roebuck for bringing it forward. At the same time he declined to support the motion, believing the appointment of a Select Committee to be unnecessary and too strong a measure for the occasion.

Lord J RUSSELL recommended that the matter should be left in the hands of the Government, whose management of our diplomatic relations ought to be unfettered.

The House then divided, when the numbers were—For Mr. Roebuck's motion, 17; against 312: majority, 295.

The motion was therefore lost

BOARD OF ADMIRALTY.

Sir C. NAPIER moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the constitution of the Board of Admiralty, with the view of rendering it more efficient and better adapted to the various duties it has to perform

Mr BENTINCK seconded the motion, condemning the practice of placing a civilian at the head of the Admiralty

Mr. B. OSBORNE defended the Admiralty from the attacks of Sir C. Napier, whom he taunted with having sought for an appointment at the Board under the system he so much condemned

After some discussion the motion was negatived by a majority of 153 to 35.

TENANT RIGHT (IRELAND).—Mr. MOORE obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the better securing of, and regulating the custom of, tenant right, as practised in the province of Ulster, and to secure compensation to improving tenants who may not make claim under the said custom, and to limit the power of eviction in certain cases

THE WEATHER AND THE CROPS.—The effect upon vegetation throughout the country, by the late rains, has been almost miraculous; owing to the warm suns and high temperature prevailing, the earth was like a hotbed, and the warmth and moisture produced results which may be almost said to have changed the face of the country in three days Accounts from all parts coincide in representing the good done by the rain to be immense, and the general condition of all crops to be most satisfactory. The wheats are looking vigorous, and of good colour. Spring corn has reaped great benefit from the showers, while the pastures which had done unusually well throughout both the winter and spring) have made surprising progress. The apple crop in Devonshire was a total failure last year, which has been much felt in the country in consequence of the large quantity of cider which is made for exportation and home consumption by the labouring population. This year, however, there is every likelihood of an abundant crop. The cold weather in the early spring gave a wholesome check to the bud, but the genial weather of the last few weeks has caused the apple-trees to blossom most luxuriantly. The fruit is many orchards has set well, and, with a continuance of recent fine weather, the bearing of apples throughout the county will, in all probability, be larger than has been known for several years.

BOMBARDMENT OF MOHAMMERAH.—We have been favoured by a Correspondent with the details of the successful attack on this place, from which we extract the following particulars: "On the 24th March the expedition left its first rendezvous at Ma'amer, and by sundown reached its second rendezvous, opposite Hurteh, a mud village, about two or three miles below the forts On the afternoon of the 25th the Assaye steamed up the river to reconnoitre, and attacked some guns in position on the left bank of the river. During the same night we secretly established a raft mortar battery, and at daylight commenced shelling the forts —the first shell breaking the leg of the Persian General of Artillery. About 6.30 the fleet got under way; their practice was so telling that at 7.45 the Feroze, followed by the Assaye, ran alongside the North Fort, and stormed them furiously with grape, canister, and shell. Till 8 20 the action continued to rage without intermission. The enemy's musketry was heavy and telling; but the rear of the 68-pounders, and their peculiar reverberation, after striking, bellowing like thunder among the distant hills, deserved all ear. The last gun of the enemy was dismounted about after ten, when the troops began to land. It was wonderful to see vessels of 1800 and 2000 tons lying close to the bank so deep is the river and so abrupt its banks, and the soldiers stepping straight from deck to shore, the ships' yards being among the date palms. The enemy was too nimble in its retreat, and no encounter between the armies took place. In the words of Sir J. Outram's despatch, "the enemy did nothing for days but run." Our loss was marvellously light, when compared with the great destruction inflicted on the enemy."

VORACITY OF A COD.—As a fishing-boat belonging to Barra was lately putting out to sea the men picked up a dead lamb, and, having skinned it, threw the skin into the sea. They then proceeded, with a sharp breeze, right aft, out into the Atlantic, till they lost sight of land. Having at length reached the fishing-place they dropped their lines. The first fish taken up was a large cod, whose belly was distended to such an extraordinary size as to excite the curiosity of the crew. They cut open the fish, and to their astonishment found in it the sailcloth skin, wool and all entire, which they had thrown overboard in the morning after leaving the shore.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

THE BISHOPRIC OF SIERRA LEONE.—It is reported that Mr. Labouchere has offered the vacant see of Sierra Leone to a real native African, in the person of the Rev. Samuel Crowther, once a slave boy, now a missionary at Abeokuta.

PREFERMENTS AND APPOINTMENTS.—Minor Canonry: The Rev. J. W Miller has been appointed to Chichester Cathedral. Deanery Rurals: Rev. J. T. TROOPS FOR INDIA.—On Sunday an order arrived at Chatham Garrison directing the whole of the troops attached to the Provisional Battalion who are available for embarkation this season belonging to the three regiments stationed in the Bombay and Madras presidencies to be held in immediate readiness to proceed to India to join the service companies of their respective regiments. Immediately on the arrival of the order the non-commissioned officers and men of the 23rd Light Infantry, 74th Highlanders, and 84th Regiments (the head-quarters of which are serving in Madras), and the 64th, 78th, 72nd Highlanders, 33rd and 86th Regiments (whose head-quarters are in Bombay, were medically inspected by Dr. A. ## EN ROUTE TO CHINA.

(From our Special Artist and Correspondent.)

I BELIEVE I told in my last of having safely crossed the Deserts without more than ten or twelve stoppages, thanks to our jovial mules, and of our arrival at the Suez Hotel, which we found so full that tribes of travellers had to sleep on the divan (which runs all round the rooms in all Egyptian houses) in the saloon; it was a regular scramble for beds. It was the same at Cairo, and for that reason Sheppeard is about to enlarge his hotel. However, on the second night we all had a bed in those glorious bed-rooms of lofty dimensions which please me so much in Egypt. I also told you of the frightful setting of oranges and lemons. Well, the battle raged with fury till the very moment of our departure The Suezites will long remember the ides of March, and the town will bear traces of the affray. One nigger we could not hit, do what we would, and he lay back in his boat, laughing heartily at our failures. Another less-favoured individual received all our missiles in his face, and his rage was so great that he actually took off his shoe to throw at us; but distant visions of policemen with whips somewhat awed him, and he refrained from his hostile intention. As all things must come to an end, so did our conflict cease, therefore, bidding adieu to the Arab consuls for the present, we got on board the little steamer that takes one to the big steamer; and, having given and received a parting cheer from the homeward-bound and others that remained on the balcony, we steamed along the Red Sea (so called on account of the intense blue of its waters, and not because it is red). We entered, at midnight our steamer, the Hindostan, and, proceeding below, secured berths, and went on deck again. Our sailors were all Bengal Lascars, in blue shirts, tight-fitting ditto trousers, straw baskets on their heads, with a turban round that; on Sundays they came out very grand in white muslin. They were, without exception, the most inanimate beings you can conceive. They never played, laughed, danced, or did anything but sit and eat rice with their right hand, or go to sleep. All the engine-boys and stokers were seedy. There were from Africa real woolly-headed Negroes, with athletic frames, always laughing, singing, or playing cards: one of them is worth six Lascars. We had two John Chinamen for carpenters quiet fellows, with their pigtails tied round their heads, and gigantic white trousers, made without regard to size, as there was room for six ordinary legs.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

CADETS IN A CAFE AT SUEZ

A number of young fellows, cadets for India, went into this café, which is the most elegant in the town, and at the same time the largest, though not boasting of many looking-glasses, as you see, nor any tables or chairs; yet the coffee is good. In the centre is a large square stone, covered with matting; a wooden pillar supports the roof, composed of beams; and two Arab oil-lamps light up this "Elegant" café. Round the room runs a stone divan, likewise covered with matting, bubble-bubbles, and narghiles. The door is, like all the café doors of Egypt, carved and open lattice-work in the Moorish style. An odour of Turkish tobacco and camels that, once smelt, can never be forgotten, and pervades every Arab town, even Alexandria—is quite supreme here. The old gentleman just going to sip his coffee (the one nearest you on the left) is a real live soldier who escorts the caravan across the desert; next to him, in full tarboosh and coffieh (as the bright-coloured silk scarf is called), sits à la Turk, and perfectly at his ease, one humble servant of our Parisian garçons. We exchange many whiffs and pass the narghilé from our respectable mouth, which piece of politeness on my part is returned by the hardy veteran by touching his forehead with the fingers of his right hand, expressive of thanks. On the stone above mentioned recline in all attitudes the merry cadets, puffing away the fragrant latakia and other delicious weeds for the solace of mankind in general and cadets in particular. Some are tugging away at the hubble-bubbles, others inhaling the gorgeous narghilé, the more lazy preferring the chibouk, and one, alas! smoking a cutty. The head-dresses, you will perceive, are not at all such as the said cadets would walk down Regent-street with, but English at home and English in Egypt are two distinct beings: at home, proud and not given to much talking; in Egypt, giving tongue freely, associating with natives, giving them unlimited backsheesh, jolly as possible, and most eccentric in costume.

In the right-hand corner, near the door, is the culinary department, with concomitant utensils for the decoction of the beverage "which cheers," &c. The chef of this cuisine, in white turban and blue overshirt, is handing a gentleman a lighted piece of charcoal at the end of a pair of tongs, as it is wont for Egyptians when the igniting of the fragrant weed is the object nearest to the heart. A small boy, a Nubian by his white skull-cap and blue shirt, is handing round the cafe. He possesses not the serviette of our Parisian garçon, nor is his linen quite so resplendent; but he is a very good garçon, and does his duty to our satisfaction. The cups, of porcelain, are in other cups of brass or metal. The gentleman with the striped hood is Achmed, our faithful guide through the bazaar at Suez, to whom I left a waistcoat, of which said Achmed was not a little proud. Good luck to him, for a faithful and jovial guide! Poor fellow, his eyes, like most natives, were very bad indeed. Through the open door a camel's head is visible; he is promenading through the bazaar. Having paid for our beverage and "bacey," we leave this most delightful spot and our noisy but hilarious friends; and, touching our foreheads and lips à l'Arabe, we depart singing; and are noisily cheered with real hurrahs by the natives in English, which they all speak, being very much up in all figurative or slang expressions, which is not to be wondered at, considering their own language abounds in metaphor.

UNLOADING SPECIE AT SUEZ.

Here is the process of transmitting your extra cash. Bars of silver and gold are put into small deal boxes, with the name of the place they are for painted in black letters on them. Each camel only carries six of these boxes—three on each side in a kind of network all camels have for carrying weights. The camels fill a square place on the wharf, which you see in the drawing, and are there loaded and unloaded. The hardy Bedouins who have walked most of the way from Cairo (eighty miles) carry enormous weights, but here one box is quite sufficient. They are carrying them to be shipped, under the direction of a gentleman with a whip. The camel in front has his leg tied to his neck for being a naughty camel: he is thus prevented from bolting. In the background you have a glimpse of the Post-office, and close to it the American Consul's. A jolly life they must have of it here.

CAVALRY COLLEGE, RICHMOND.

On Monday the foundation-stone of an institution long needed in the British service was laid upon a tract of ground adjoining Richmond-green. The object of this new establishment is to give sound practical information to such gentlemen as intend to enter the cavalry service as a profession. The college has been founded under distinguished patronage, including the leading cavalry officers, and a large number of the aristocracy. Among others present on Monday were the Duchess of St. Albans, the Earl of Essex, the Ladies Pelham Clinton, Lieutenant-General Lord Downes, Lady Raglan, Colonel Douglas, General Cannon, Viscount and Viscountess Combermere, and upwards of 300 general visitors. Lord and Lady Combermere were received by Mr. Wallace Barrow, the resident commandant, and other officers of the college; and, having inspected the spacious riding-school (recently erected in the grounds as a temporary provision until a larger school is built), they were conducted to a marquee, where the site, where, a prayer for the occasion having been offered up by the Rev. Dr. Emerton, Mr. Stocqueler read an address to Lady Combermere, which, after referring in high terms to the military achievements of the Field Marshal Viscount Combermere, pointed out the necessity which existed for the institution of the Cavalry College, and expressing to Lady Combermere the gratitude of the committee for her Ladyship presiding at this meeting, to which her Ladyship made a short but gracious reply. A handsome silver trowel was then presented to her Ladyship, who very gracefully adjusted the mortar. The stone was then lowered to its intended place, in which some coins were deposited, and, after the blessing was pronounced, the ceremony terminated. The band of the 1st Life Guards were stationed in the grounds.

An elegant déjeuner, provided in great profusion by Mr. Willis, of St. James's-street, was then served in the lecture-hall of the college, which had been tastefully decorated for the occasion. The customary loyal toasts were followed by the healths of Lord and Lady Combermere, in responding to which the Field Marshal said that he most cordially approved of the college, and knew that it was thought hopefully of at head-quarters. He trusted that its beneficial effects in the service would be soon evinced, and lasting in their operation; and he considered it of vital importance that professional occupations should fill up the time that elapsed between young men leaving school and entering the service. He trusted, too, that infantry officers who looked to being majors and adjutants would attend the college, if only to learn to ride. After the déjeuner, quadrille parties were formed in the lecture-hall and under the marquee on the lawn, and dancing was prolonged with much spirit to an advanced hour of the evening. The day's proceedings owe much of their success to the judicious management of Mr. Stocqueler.

The new college building (of which we engrave a View) will be a handsome edifice in the Romanesque style: the central portion, to accommodate fifty pupils, is expected by the architect, Mr. Broadbridge, to be finished within four months.

PRESENTATION OF THE FREEDOM OF THE CITY TO DR. LIVINGSTONE.

The Court of Common Council presented an unusually gay appearance on Thursday, the 21st inst., in consequence of the attendance of a number of ladies to witness the ceremony of presenting the freedom of the city to Dr. Livingstone, as a testimonial in recognition of his zealous and persevering exertions in the important discoveries he has made in Africa—by which geographical, geological, and their kindred sciences have been advanced, and facts ascertained that may extend the trade and commerce of this country, and hereafter secure to the native tribes of the vast African continent the blessings of knowledge and civilisation. Dr. Livingstone was introduced amid great applause by Mr. J. E. Saunders and Alderman Rose, the mover and seconder of the resolution; and, after the declaration of freedom was read, was addressed by Sir John Key, Bart., the Chamberlain, in a highly eulogistic speech, in which were fully detailed the difficulties overcome and the benefits to science and art achieved by his indomitable zeal. Dr. Livingstone's address, in reply, was vehemently cheered; and after receiving the congratulations of the Lord Mayor and the principal members of the Corporation, and of the Lady Mayoress and several ladies, he retired amid great applause.

The freedom was presented to the Doctor in an ornamental box or casket, designed and manufactured by Messrs. Spink and Son, of Gracechurch-street.

The box itself is of African oak, with representations of miniature palm-trees in frosted silver at each corner. Upon each of the four sides is a silver plate—upon that in front is engraved the resolution of the Court, that at the back represents an African scene, with the Doctor exploring a river; at the ends are Science and Commerce in bold relief. Science is surrounded by a globe, compass, and telescope; Commerce, by coal-pits, shafts, &c. The lid is surmounted by a group of figures—an European holding the hand of friendship to an African under a palm-tree. The design is highly characteristic, and the metal-work is beautifully executed.

RESTORATION-DAY (29TH OF MAY) AT UPTON-ON-SEVERN, WORCESTERSHIRE.

RESTORATION-DAY IN WORCESTERSHIRE.

MANY relics of olden time linger in and around the faithful city of Worcester: its buildings carry us back to the times of Wulstan and downwards; but in many parts of the county the customs of the people yet partake of the character which conferred on our land the title of Merry England, which has more particularly impress on Worcestershire that of the Rebellion and the slept on the night before that memorable night. Several castles and mansions, which before that time raised their proud towers in conscious strength, either bear marks of the blows of a stranger, or live only in the traditions of the country people. A high bank, with a ditch at the foot, often marks the spot where a skirmish took place between the rival armies. In fact, you can scarcely go into any little town that does not in some way call back the struggles and triumphs of both Royalists and Republicans.

Among the customs which still survive, but which will in all probability soon be swallowed up by the awfully business habits of modern times, is that of celebrating the Restoration, on the 29th of May. Our illustration shows a small street in Upton-upon-Severn, where "Oak-apple Day" is anxiously looked forward to by old and young. Early in the morning ropes are stretched across the street, upon which are hung garlands, composed of all such flowers as are in bloom; and many are the specialities of the garland-makers for weeks before as to whether lilac and laburnum will be in their beauty by that time. The garlands are also ornamented with coloured ribbons and handkerchiefs, and all the teaspoons which can be collected are hung in the middle. Maypoles, though less common, and large boughs of oak are pressed into service. Many are the penn'orths of gold leaf sold the day before with which to gild the oak-apple for the button-hole.

A band at dusk meets on this day, and walks in procession (with band and flags) to church; after which they make a progress through the town, with music playing and colours flying, finishing up with a dinner—that bond of amity with Englishmen.

All this may be very obstructive to business; but we cannot see smiling faces—proofs of joyous hearts—without wishing that our national habits allowed of a few more such general rejoicings, never minding whether they took their origin from the triumph of Royalist or Republican.

CREMORNE GARDENS.

SOMEWHAT more than a century and a quarter since, when Lacy, the patentee of Drury-lane Theatre, first projected a rival to Vauxhall Gardens, the site of Beaufort House (once the abode of the great Sir Thomas More), bordering upon what is now called Cremorne, was selected for the purpose. Sir Hans Sloane outbid the patentee, who, with the other shareholders in the speculation, purchased the ground next Chelsea Hospital gardens, and there established the aristocratic Ranelagh.

The Cremorne estate—originally known as Chelsea Farm—was in 1751 the property of the Dowager Countess of Exeter; Sir Richard Lyttleton, in 1770; and the Duchess of Bridgewater, in 1777. It devolved in 1803 to the Viscount Cremorne, after whom the property has since been named. The villa—stated to have been built by Theophilus, Earl of Huntingdon, in the reign of George II.—was then removed, and the present mansion built by one of the Wyatts. Among its adornments was a painted window by Jarvis, which remains to this day. Early in the present century George III and Queen Charlotte frequently visited at Cremorne House a German nobleman; and this probably led to the Royal visits to the Chelsea Bunhouse. Cremorne was then a quiet retreat, as its maze upon the Thames bank; and in the rear of the house well-planted walks, shrubbery, and flower-garden, and grounds, extending to the King's-road, where the sign of the "World's End" bespoke the still life of this western extremity of once-famed Chelsea. Its celebrities have passed away, or had been dispersed—the last of Don Saltero's curiosities had been "thrown away," and were remembered but in the pages of the Tatler; the Chelsea china-works were no longer to be traced, but single specimens fetched the price of a dinner-service; and the original "Chelsea Bun House" had been taken down just at the moment when Cremorne started upon a new career of celebrity. The splendour of Vauxhall was fast flickering out; the place was fairly worn away, the trees had become scrubby, and the lewis almost singed off; when it occurred to an entrepreneur to form a sort of new Vauxhall at Cremorne, higher up the river, and in purer air—the greater distance from the City being compensated by the substitution of the steamer for the Thames wherry as the most popular conveyance. Then it was well fitted for a house of entertainment: its famous collection of paintings had disappeared, and its Vandykes were sought in vain; but the gardens and grounds, in their natural beauty and picturesqueness, were just the place for artistic decoration.

We shall pass over several tenancies, including an attempt to render Cremorne an academic grove, entitled the Stadium, to reach the proprietorship of the present owner, Mr. T. B. Simpson, who, after expending many thousand pounds upon the property, has rendered it a beautifully-embellished garden. Its extent is about sixteen acres. Many of the fine old trees remain, and among the celebrities are three lofty acacias, stated to have been planted by Pippo Saib and his sons, when on a visit to the owner of Cremorne House. The present embellishments include also a large picture of Berne, with a model Swiss cottage; a castellated firework building; a covered circus for horsemanship, two theatres; and a large number of casts from celebrated statues and vases of the classic ages.

Among the additions for the present season is a new theatre for the performance of "Marionettes;" a new facade to the circus, painted with a large copy of the "Aurora" of Guido; and, longo intervallo, Andrew Ducrow riding, exhibiting his many-horse feat. Our Artist has illustrated the Vauxhall feature of the place—the outdoor orchestra, adjoining which is a line of boxes reminding one of the days, if not the embellishments, of Hogarth and Hayman. "The Chinese Pinaforn," as this dancing area is termed, will accommodate from 2000 to 3000 persons; the inclosing ironwork has been enriched, by Defries and Son, with devices in emerald and garnet-glass circles, and semicircles of lustres and gas jets, which have a most brilliant effect. The place is many times gayer than Vauxhall on its most brilliant nights, and thousands of extra lamps, and Cremorne, with its countless attractions, may be enjoyed at a quarter the expense of its costly prototype. Fine weather brings several thousand persons to the Gardens in one evening; and fireworks at an early hour conclude the entertainments of this very popular resort.

IMPROVEMENTS OF THE DWELLINGS OF THE LABOURING CLASSES.

IN a former Number we published a View of the Strand Buildings, a model lodging-house about to be erected in Eagle-court, Angel-court, Strand, by an association promoted under the Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1855. This act gives facilities for carrying out the object of the Strand Buildings Company, but, in order to allay any doubt as to the limitation of the liability of shareholders, the prospectus of the company has been submitted to the eminent counsel on such matters, Charles Wordsworth, Esq., who has stated, "I am of opinion that a shareholder in this association will be liable only to the extent of his shares not paid up, and even such liability cannot arise until it is shown that there are no corporate funds."

The object of the company is to prove that investments in the erection of improved labourers' dwellings can be made profitable when the neighbourhood and site are judiciously selected. A more fit and appropriate site than Eagle-court for the experiment it would be difficult to find in the metropolis. The neighbourhood is densely populated, and the rents paid for inadequate accommodation exceedingly high.

The site has been granted by the Duke of Bedford to Viscount Ingestre, M.P., the Chairman and promoter of the company, upon highly advantageous terms. A large portion of the capital, £2870, has been already subscribed, at a trifling expenditure, through the indefatigable exertions of the chairman and committee. A sum of between £800 and £900 is still required previously to the commencement of the building (for which the preliminary arrangements are completed). It is, therefore, hoped that the exertions of the noble promoter will be immediately assisted by all those who interest themselves in this important social problem, and that success may induce the noble Lord to increased exertions in so worthy a cause. The honorary secretaries are Rice Ives and George Morgan, Esqrs., 3, Dane's-inn, Strand.

ST. ANN'S SOCIETY.—The girls' annual meeting for examination of certificates of character and distribution of rewards was held on Tuesday, at the Asylum, Brixton-hill—the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Durham in the chair. The Chairman stated the object of the meeting, which was the assembling of those formerly educated in the schools of the society, who, bringing with them characters from their present employers, received rewards under the rules. The written characters of fifty-three girls were then read by the Secretary, after which the Chairman delivered the rewards, with a word of encouragement or congratulation to each recipient.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MAY 30, 1857.

AN educational movement, under the high auspices of his Ro Highness the Prince Consort, has been announced as shortly to commenced by a public meeting, at which the Prince will u the chair. The objects of the movement are, as we understand, collect facts with regard to the causes which prevent the isting means of education from being available to the children the labouring classes and the poor; and not for the elaboration of new theory or system of National Education, either secular or religio
Such a movement, made under such high direction and patronage, but be productive of good. It is painfully notorious to all w use their eyes and understanding that the bulk of the child of England are not educated. At the same time it is almost equa notorious, if statistics are good for anything, that such large nu bers of English children from the ages of six to ten or twe attend school, that the reproach of indifference to education ou not to be levelled either against the lower or upper classes. Wh then, is the discrepancy between fact and figures? Does it not li the fact that the school attendances of multitudes of children next to valueless, because they are taken from school at early an age? Or may it not be accounted for on the s position that Sunday-school education, which forbids writi arithmetic, geography, and all the sciences, and which o permits reading—with the Bible for a spelling-book—is not itself sufficient to constitute an education to fit a child for business of life? If the education which is paraded before public by figures in statistical tables is insufficient and in ferent—and if the children be submitted for too short a pe even to this indifferent and insufficient course of instructio all our boasts of the progress of education among the ma of the people have no foundation; and the young rem in ignorance, although there are abundance of schools, no lack of teachers. We trust that the proposed quiry will embrace both of these classes of facts. The cou must not only learn how soon a stern and inevitable neces compels the parent to take his child from school, to work for subsistence of the family, but how little qualified Sunday-school

the minds of British children, and to fit them for playing a pro remedy, we admit, is full of difficulties; but the collection of facts will serve a beneficial end. If we cannot compel parents, need the labour of their children for their own subsistence and t of their offspring, to keep them at school beyond a certain per or even to send them to school at all, we can at least see how this necessity is to be modified by delegating to the employe infant labour the duty of educating the children by whose w he is partly enabled to thrive. We can also see to what ext without doing violence to conscientious scruples, or interfering w religious belief, we may induce the managers of Sunday-scho to include writing, arithmetic, geography, geology, astronomy, other branches of study, among the religious exercises of only clear day that the children of the labouring poor have their disposal for mental and religious improvement. If such movement in advance could be made, the existing means of edu

tion in England might be much more largely and more beneficially used than at present; and there would be all the less reason for the establishment of that National System of Education which many good and humane people look upon with distrust and distaste, for political and religious reasons. We have many schools, and many teachers, and much money for educational purposes; but for all except the rich of the upper, and the well-to-do of the middle, classes we have very little education in this country. To be able to spell Ebenezer or Jeremiah is no doubt a good thing; but it would be better for the child who can do so much if he could also go through the multiplication-table, keep books by single or double entry, and extract the square and cube roots. We put it for the consideration of the eminent philanthropists and philosophers who are to support the Prince in this movement whether, after they shall have collected their facts, it will not greatly facilitate their objects if they can agree upon some broad fundamental principle in this matter? Were there no Poor-law in England we can easily suppose how difficult a thing it would be to provide for the relief of the destitute, whether young or old; and what a clamour would be raised if any daring statesman attempted to tax the country for their maintenance. But, the right of the poor to subsistence having been accepted as a fundamental principle, there is found to be no practical difficulty in working the machinery or in raising the money to provide for them. So, in like manner, with education. If it were boldly laid down as a principle that it is the right of every British child to be taught reading, writing, and arithmetic, and that it is as criminal in any one to prevent them from being instructed in these branches of education as, under the Poor-law, it is to starve them to death, a great many difficulties which now look very formidable would diminish and disappear.

Until such a great principle is solemnly made the basis of our legislation upon the subject, little real progress will be made. The legislation upon the subject, little real progress will be made. The legislature, believe, is ripening to that consummation, and the efforts of the Prince Consort and those who support his Royal Highness in the movement will tend to expedite it. The unworthy fear that the working and lower classes could be too well instructed has nearly died out from amongst us. It is recognised at last that there are no practical limits to education; that every day of life affords the means of self-culture to the wise; and that, however well informed the poor may become, the rich, having more leisure, may become better informed still. Of all enemies to rational freedom, to contentment, and to peace, Ignorance is the worst and the most savage. A well-instructed people will be a loyal, a moral, and a religious people. It is only when the upper and middle classes are inf erior in morality and in education to the lower that the existing institutions of society become endangered. Of such a catastrophe there is not the remotest risk in this country. To whatever elevation the poor may attain, the rich will go beyond it. Fortunately this truth is recognised both by rich and poor, to their mutual advantage.

ALTHOUGH the Attorney-General has not yet seen his way to the successful prosecution of the too notorious managers and directors of the Royal British Bank, he has introduced into Parliament a bill which is likely to become law, and which will effectually provide in future for the punishment of such offenders. Sir Richard Bethell's bill is a comprehensive one, and includes provisions for the trial and punishment of fraudulent breaches of trust, whether committed by trustees and executors, or by bankers. Bankers there must be; and bankers in the exercise of the calling by which they live will be as ready as ever to undertake the charge of the moneys of their clients, and to bear the new responsibilities created by Sir Richard Bethell's Act; but we doubt very much whether, under the new system, persons will be found to incur the liabilities of trusts and executorships so readily as they do at present, and whether the result of the measure will not be to make the Court of Chancery the general trustee and executor of the British people. Under the operation of such a law as Sir Richard has introduced, foolhardy will be the man who consents to be an executor; rash, and indifferent to his own peace of mind, will be he who accepts the troublesome, the thankless, the dangerous office of trustee to any person or to any estate whatsoever. But, leaving this point for future consideration, and recommending it to the thorough discussion of the common-law lawyers as well as of the equity practitioners of the House of Commons, we pass to those portions of Sir Richard Bethell's bill which define the liabilities of the managers and directors of public companies, bodies corporate, joint-stock associations, and banks. In the admirable judgment of Mr. Commissioner Holroyd on the affairs of the Royal British Bank, of which we last week gave the substance, it was shown in detail how the directors and others had offended against the laws of commercial morality and of private honesty, and in what way they had broken faith, not only with the Crown which had granted them a charter, but with their own unfortunate depositors, and still more unfortunate shareholders. If they escaped punishment in consequence of any vagueness, looseness, or deficiency in the existing law, the same impunity will not attend any other persons in their situation who may be tempted hereafter to run a similar course of dishonesty. In this case the horse may have been stolen without hope of recovery; but the stable door will be shut in future, and it will be as easy to punish fraudulent bankers, directors, and managers of companies, as it is now to punish pickpockets, footpads, forgers, burglars, and highwaymen. Under the designation of misdemeanour, a crime punishable by penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years, are to be included such offences in the management, or rather the mismanagement, of joint-stock funds as were brought to light during the late protracted examination before the Court of Bankruptcy, and many other offences of a cognate description. To take fraudulently any of the property or funds of a public company; to destroy, falsify, or alter, or to be privy and consenting to the destruction, falsification, or alteration of, the books of such company; to circulate, or join in circulating, by advertisement, or prospectus, or otherwise, any false statement, with the intention of deceiving any member, shareholder, or creditor of a company, or with the intention of inducing any person to become a shareholder, partner, or depositor in such concern;—all these offences are to be considered misdemeanours, rendering the persons guilty of them able to be placed at the bar of the Central Criminal Court. It is our English fashion to deal with affairs as they arise; to make laws to suit emergencies; to patch the public shoe at such places—and such only, whether it be toe or heel—where the gap or the abrasion may show itself; and for this reason Parliament and the public will, we suppose, be content to receive the bill of the Attorney-General. At some future time, perhaps, the necessity of a codification and simplification of our Commercial Law, which is notoriously the most cumbrous and the most uncertain in Europe, will become apparent to a strong and willing Minister. In the meantime the country must merely look for instalments of justice. Sir Richard Bethell's bill is an instalment—and a "step in the right direction;" and as such—with an amendment, we trust, of the sections relative to trusteeships and executorships—the country will accept it, and look forward to the day when its code of commercial laws will be made so clear and simple that he who runs may read and understand it.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE NEW READING ROOM AT THE BRITISH MUSEUM.—An advertisement has appeared to this effect: "Numerous applications being made daily to view the new Reading Room, the trustees have ordered that the public shall be admitted for that purpose between the hours of six and eight o'clock p.m., from the 27th inst. to the 30th of June next, inclusive, Sundays excepted.'

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.—The following rules have been sanctioned for the admission to this museum, which will be opened to the public in June:—The collections of objects relating to education, architecture, and trade, of pictures, sculpture, ornamental art, and models of patented inventions, will be open to the public daily, from ten till four in the daytime, and from seven to ten in the evening on Mondays and Thursdays, except during the appointed vacations. On Mondays, Tuesdays, and Saturdays, and daily during the Easter and Christmas weeks, the public will be admitted free; but on these days, books, models, examples, casts, &c., cannot be removed for study. On Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays the public will be admitted on payment of 6d. each person. This sum during the daytime will enable any person to consult any books, diagrams, &c., in the collections of education, and to copy any article in the collections of art, except modern paintings, for which special permission in writing must be obtained. In the evening, works cannot be removed. An annual ticket of admission to all the collections, morning and evening, may be obtained for 10s. The Library of Art is open every day from eleven a.m. to nine p.m., except Saturday, when it is closed at four p.m., and the usual vacations. All registered students of the Central School of Art have free admission to the library. Occasional students are admitted upon payment of 6d., which will entitle them to entrance for six days from the day of the payment of the fee, inclusive. A monthly ticket may be obtained for 1s. 6d., and an annual admission for 10s.

MR. SHEEPSHANKS' COLLECTION.—The fireproof building erected to receive Mr. Sheepshanks' munificent gift being on the point of completion, that gentleman has handed over the whole of his pictures and drawings to the Department of Art; and it is understood that the pictures and drawings will be exhibited to the public early in the coming month, when the Museum of Art at South Kensington will open.

EXETER HALL.—On Sunday night the first of a series of Sunday evening sermons, under the sanction of the Bishop of London, was preached by the Bishop of Carlisle, in the large room of Exeter Hall, which was densely crowded. On the front row of the platform were the Earl of Shaftesbury, the Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., Robert Baxter, Esq., M.P., and a number of other gentlemen. The special service was commenced by the reading of the Litany and the singing of hymns selected for the occasion, copies of which were printed and circulated by the direction of the special service committee. The Bishop of Carlisle took his text from Romans iv. 3, "What saith the Scriptures?" and addressed his audience in an energetic manner for nearly an hour. The service concluded with a hymn and the usual benediction.

THE ROYAL GENERAL ANNUITY SOCIETY.—On Sunday a sermon was preached by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury in the parish church of St. Matthew, Bethnal-green, in aid of the funds of the above institution. The sacred edifice was crowded. At the close of the service a liberal subscription was made. This useful society was established in 1827, for allowing annuities to decayed merchants, bankers, professional men, master manufacturers, tradesmen, their widows, and clerks, and to single females, daughters of persons belonging to such classes of society, without distinction of religion, sect, or country.

THE CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.—A grand choral festival is to be given in Westminster Abbey, on Thursday, June 18th, on behalf of the Choir Benevolent Fund, which was established some years since for the purpose of forming a fund for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the clerks connected with the various cathedrals.

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL.—The anniversary dinner in aid of the funds of this hospital took place at the London Tavern on Friday, the 22nd inst.—the Duke of Wellington in the chair. This institution, which was founded in 1851, is the only foundation of the kind in all the great and rapidly-extending neighbourhood which has grown up around the terminus of the Great Western Railway, under the name of "Paddington." The present cost of the charity is £2000; of which the income from regular annual subscriptions, &c., is only £3000; leaving £4000 to be obtained by the anniversary dinner, concerts, sermons, legacies, &c.

CAMBRIDGE ASYLUM.—The annual meeting of this institution, which was founded in 1851 for the relief of soldiers' widows, in memory of his Royal Highness the late Duke of Cambridge, was held on Monday afternoon, at the United Service Institution, Whitehall-yard—the Right Hon. Lord Redesdale in the chair. From the report it appeared that the income of the institution was £6625 19s. 11d., whilst the expenditure was only £3790 15s 2d. Among many instances of munificence towards this institution it was stated that the late General Sir N. Thorn, Colonel of the Buffs, had undertaken to erect, furnish, and endow in perpetuity eight rooms for widows of non-commissioned officers and privates of his regiment; and also to erect a chapel capable of containing 100 persons.

PRINTERS' PENSION SOCIETY.—The Printers' Pension Society dinner took place on Friday, the 22nd inst., at the London Tavern—the Duke of Wellington presiding. The subscription amounted to about £500; and the whole festival went off in the most satisfactory manner.

THE NEWSVENDERS' BENEVOLENT AND PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.—The annual meeting of the friends of this institution was held on Wednesday, at the Freemasons' Tavern. The report was adopted; and the company adjourned to a very elegant supper, which was presided over by Mr. John Walter, M.P. The subscription list amounted to upwards of £100.

ROYAL GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.—The anniversary meeting of this institution was held on Monday, at the society's house, 15, Whitehall—Sir Roderick I. Murchison, the president, in the chair. The report of the council, detailing the progress of the society during the past year, was read and adopted. The finances of the institution are in a flourishing condition. The President then delivered the society's gold medals, which had been awarded to Colonel A. Walsh, Surveyor-General of India, for his valuable geodetic operations in that country; and to Mr. A. C. Gregory, for his extensive and important explorations in Western and Northern Australia. The President next delivered an address on the progress of geographical research during the past year. Sir R. Murchison was re-elected President for the ensuing year. The anniversary was celebrated by a dinner at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, in the evening.

SECONDARY PUNISHMENTS.—The result of the Mansion House meetings, on Mr. Pearson's proposed measures (the last of which was held on Tuesday), has been the passing of the following resolution: "That it is considered by this meeting that it is desirable that the Secretary of State for the Home Department should be empowered and recommended in certain cases to substitute for fixed periods of imprisonment and transportation a proportionate number of hours of labour, to be performed by convicted criminals in this country or in the colonies as considerations of economy and expediency may dictate. And also to provide in all such cases for the moral and religious instruction of each criminal, with an allowance of food, bodily comfort, rest, and recreation, corresponding in character and amount with his conduct and industry in confinement, so as to excite motives, powers, and habits of industry, self-reliance, and self-control, and thus to render criminals the voluntary instruments of their own maintenance, punishment, reformation, and release."

CORPORATION OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.—The annual meeting of the governors of this corporation, for the election of widows and aged single daughters of deceased clergymen to permanent pensions, was held at the corporation-house, in Bloomsbury-place, on the 26th inst. The applications of 145 ladies, widows and aged single daughters of clergymen, seeking assistance from the funds of the society, were submitted, forty-one of whom were elected to pensions, and 100 received small donations. The total number of pensioners was stated to be 711, of whom 405 are widows. The pensions are from £10 to £25 per annum, and are raised from time to time as the funds allow.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—On Tuesday evening Mr. Robert Stephenson, as President to the Institution of Civil Engineers, gave his Annual Conversazione, which was attended by the leading men of science and letters. The theatre of the Institution and the suite of rooms were brilliantly lighted, and the walls were hung with paintings; the exhibition of working models of scientific inventions, and beautiful works in the metallic and ceramic arts proved very attractive; the arrangements by the secretary, Mr. Charles Manby, F.R.S., were very complete; and the fête was altogether a highly successful réunion. The Princess of Oude and their suite were present in their richly-jewelled costumes; and the number of guests in official dresses (it being her Majesty's birthday) was very considerable.

THE CHARITY CHILDREN AT ST. PAUL'S.—On Thursday morning, according to annual custom, the children connected with the various charity schools in the metropolis attended service at St. Paul's Cathedral. The children of each school went in procession through the metropolis, with the incumbent of the parish and the churchwardens at their head, and on arriving at St. Paul's took their places on raised seats on the floor beneath the dome. Full choral service was performed, and the sermon was preached by the Bishop of London.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—On Wednesday the usual apposition and distribution of prizes took place in St. Paul's School, in the presence of the Rev. Dr. Kynaston, the High Master; the Bishop of Chichester, the Bishop of Lichfield, the Rev. Archdeacon Hale, the Wardens of the Mercers' Company, Mr. Adderley, M.P., and a large number of visitors.

THE ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.—Tuesday afternoon the annual general meeting of the friends and supporters of this institution was held in the Lecture Theatre of the United Service Institution, Whitehall-yard—Vice-Admiral Bowles, C.B., the president, in the chair. According to the balance-sheet the total receipts for the year, including the amounts paid for board and tuition, and received for the different scholarships, was £3433 18s. 8d. The total expenditure was £3230 6s. 1d.

SALE OF REDPATH'S EFFECTS.—On Saturday the third day's sale of the effects of Leopold Redpath took place at Messrs. Christie and Manson's. This is the last of his property for sale under the fiat of bankruptcy. A number of pictures were sold, which brought high prices. Saturday's sale produced £4962; and the three days' sale realised about £8000.

THE UNEMPLOYED OF LONDON.—The ship Southern Cross, belonging to Messrs. Bennett and Aspinwall, which left Gravesend on Saturday last, for New Zealand, had on board a large number of emigrants—about sixty of whom, at the invitation of the charterers, had been selected by Captain Neale Porter from the unemployed workmen of London, in whose welfare he has taken great interest.

CARDINAL WISEMAN ON ART.—On Wednesday afternoon Cardinal Wiseman delivered the second of two lectures (the first having been given on Friday, the 22nd inst.) "On the Manner of Collecting and Arranging a National Gallery of Paintings," at the Marylebone Literary and Scientific Institution, Edwards-street, Portman-square. The Cardinal was surrounded on the platform by many artists of eminence and others interested in art.

MR. BARON CHANNELL AND THE HOME CIRCUIT.—A banquet was given to Mr. Baron Channell on Saturday evening last at the Albion, Aldersgate-street, by the members of the Home Circuit, to celebrate his elevation to the judicial bench. One hundred gentlemen sat down to dinner. The party was joined by Sir F. Thesiger, Mr. Russell Gurney, and other former members of the circuit. Mr. Serjeant Shee, the present leader, presided; and the most hearty reception was given by the company to their distinguished guest.

THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE.—A meeting of the members and friends of this association "for the total suppression of the liquor traffic" was held on Tuesday evening, at Exeter Hall. The Hon. Neal Dow, of Portland, Maine, addressed the meeting, and strenuously advocated a "Maine Law," which, he said, he had no doubt would be passed in England. Various resolutions were adopted in support of the objects of the association.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS IN LONDON.—Last week the births of 895 boys and 748 girls, in all 1643 children—were registered in London. In the ten corresponding weeks of the years 1847-56 the average number was 1489. Of the weekly deaths registered in London were, in the week that ended on Saturday, 948. In the ten years 1847-56 the average number of deaths in the weeks corresponding with last week was 1007. The deaths of last week were less by 160 than the number which would have occurred under the average rate of mortality in the third week of May.

MARYLEBONE FREE LIBRARY.—This institution, which started under such favourable auspices, has at last proved a failure, and is about to be closed—the ratepayers having some time since declined to sanction a rate, and the voluntary aid afforded being found (after a lengthened trial) quite inadequate to the support of the establishment, even under the most economical arrangements. It is to be shut up on Wednesday, the 24th of June next. The books are to be returned to such of the donors as may apply for them prior to the cessation of the business of the library.

PLAIN SPEAKING.—(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)—Having seen a paragraph in your last Saturday's number, May 23rd, headed "Plain Speaking," and containing an extract from the Dublin Freeman's Journal, I should be much obliged if you would insert these few words upon it. The letter, purporting to be written by Lord Orford was first published in a London newspaper in the year 1823, whereas the extract puts it in the present tense:—"Lord Orford writes as follows." One can hardly understand how such a mistake can have occurred; and, at any rate, it seems hard that after a lapse of thirty-four years, one might have, added wisdom and reflection, the follies of past times should be reproduced against a nobleman, now in old age, who lives a quiet, unobtrusive life, whose name seldom appears in print, and who, at the time it did so, not ungracefully, is assisting at a meeting for the establishment of a free library at Norwich. Hard, I have said, if true harder (and yet not so hard in truth) when the charge is in without foundation. When, in 1823, the letter was first published in a London newspaper, a near relative of Lord Orford wrote to the Secretary of the Norwich Bible Society to ask if it were true that such a letter had been received by him. His answer was a clear and positive denial. Lord Orford, he said, in declining their invitation to be their president, had done so in a very courteous letter. Had I no personal feeling in the matter I should have felt it but right to have informed you of the true state of the case; and I feel sure you will not be tardy in doing justice where, I am convinced, you had no intention to wound.—I remain, &c., R. W. J.

WRECK OF THE "MARTIN LUTHER" (See page 410).—We have received a communication from Captain Christian, of the steam ship Tagus, relative to the services of Lieutenant Cartwright in saving the 630 souls on board the Martin Luther. Captain Christian says:—"I have no desire to detract from Lieutenant Cartwright's courageous conduct in volunteering to accompany my third officer, Mr. Johnson, to ascertain the condition of the wreck. The boat was in sole charge of Mr Johnson, who carried out my orders with as the public are aware the happiest results."

THE MONSTER SHIP AT MILLWALL.

WHEN we compare the humble beginnings of Steam Navigation which has practically only existed within the last forty years, and contrast the little Clyde steamer—puffing, straining, and sputtering away at the tremendous rate of nine miles an hour; striving to disguise her "odious funnel;" and her wonderful cock-boat of boat-shelves at each side"—when we contrast this marvel of the day with the floating palaces that now carry civilisation to the most distant ends of the globe, we may well be overwhelmed with wonder at the rapid progress which British skill, wealth, and energy have effected in so brief a period.

Years rapidly—the unimportant improvements in steam navigation until Mr. David Napier adventured and successfully established a regular communication between Britain and the surrounding countries, and obtained the dominion of the open sea by means of steam. Between the years 1818 and 1822 he had conferred upon the public the benefits of the steam-packet postal system, and had given to commercial enterprize a new and powerful impetus by the establishment of the first line of trading steam-ships between Liverpool, Greenock, and Glasgow. The construction, in 1822, of the James Watt, to ply between Leith and London, was a great stride in this branch of nautical architecture. Her dimensions were 146 feet over all, 26 feet beam, and 16 feet depth of hold. She carried two engines, and, for beauty of form, strength of construction, and speed, was regarded as the model of sea-going steamers, and for many years maintained her supremacy over all competitors. Her fame was, however, destined to be eclipsed by the construction of what may be designated the leviathan class of steamers, employed for the performance of long voyages, with heavy cargoes and numerous passages, with a celerity and certainty that sailing-vessels could never attain. The voyage between this country and America was, however, the great achievement to which English skill and enterprise had yet to be directed. A company was formed to carry out this project; and the Great Western was built under the superintendence of a man who, like Richelieu, never permitted the word "fail" into his vocabulary. In 1838 Mr. I. K. Brunel had the satisfaction of witnessing his first great steamer perform the voyage to America in fifteen days, in perfect safety. Leviathan steam-ships on the screw and paddle principle now begun to be employed regularly between Europe and America; and in July, 1840, the Cunard line of steamers was established for the conveyance of the mails between Liverpool and Halifax. Increasing in magnitude as they were successively built, these vessels, which at first measured 1140 tons each, rose to 1830 tons. The Collins Company, formed in America to compete with Cunard's, commenced running their steam-ships in 1850, and astonished the world with magnificent vessels, of 3000 tons burden, performing the voyage to and from New York in an average run of twelve days; establishing the important fact that the speed of a vessel increased in a ratio corresponding to her size.

The trade to the East Indies and China, previous to the introduction of ocean steamers, had been carried on by sailing-vessels, via the Cape of Good Hope. In 1836 the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Company commenced operations by running steamers from England to Alexandria, whence the mails and passengers were transported by the Overland route across the desert to Suez, where they were reshipped in other steamers belonging to the company, and conveyed down the Red Sea to India. The superb fleet of steamers built by this company, headed by the celebrated Himalaya, an iron screw-ship of 3550 tons, and the Persia, launched last year, have well deserved the praises bestowed upon them; but their usefulness was limited by the barrier of the desert and the inevitable inconvenience and delay of the Overland journey across the burning sands of Egypt. It was, moreover, felt by the commercial interests connected with the gigantic trade of India and China that the existing monopoly of the Oriental and Peninsular Company might be advantageously enlarged; and, the matter being brought before Parliament, a committee of inquiry, with Lord Jocelyn at its head, was appointed to report upon it. After mature deliberation the committee reported against the continuance of the monopoly, and in the following year the Eastern Steam Navigation Company, then recently established, endeavoured to obtain a portion, at least, of the Government contract for carrying the Indian mails which the Oriental and Peninsular Company had hitherto held. Failing in this, the new company sold the two steamers which were being built for them at Bristol, and determined to try if the difficulties which opposed direct steam communication with India and Australia could not be removed. Calling to their assistance Mr Brunel whose previous triumphs in steam navigation had given him a world-wide celebrity, he perceived that the time had come when the question should be settled as to the superiority of steam-ships over sailing-ships when employed upon world round voyages. In looking about for the cause of the failure of the steamers employed in the Australian trade to make such voyages in less time than clipper sailing-ships, or vessels fitted with auxiliary steam-power, he saw that the principles he held twenty years previously with reference to the Atlantic trade were applicable in an eminent degree to voyaging viâ the Cape; and he came to the conclusion that a vessel might be built of a capacity for carrying sufficient fuel to render her independent of supplies to be derived from coaling dépôts during the voyage, to which dépôts coal had to be sent, at an immense cost, by many ships from London. Full of this grand idea, he applied to Mr. John Scott Russell, the eminent engineer and iron-ship builder of Millwall, to know if he would undertake the construction of a steam-ship of the required magnitude. Mr. Russell eagerly seized upon a suggestion of which his comprehensively practical mind instantly perceived the value, and, setting earnestly to work upon Mr. Brunel's design, he had in one day nearly completed his rough plans of the vessel, when Mr. Brunel came to him and said he had changed his mind about his new ship Mr. Russell was confounded, for he had set his heart upon building the largest steamer that had ever been launched. "I find, on consideration," continued Brunel, "that a ship of the size I proposed will not answer our purpose. We shall want one of sufficient capacity to carry 5000 or 6000 tons of coal for the voyage out and home." He had evidently calculated every detail and bearing of the question, and found that, although the delay of coaling on the voyage would be avoided by his original design, yet the cost of sending to an Australian port the quantity of coal necessary for the homeward voyage would still be enormous, and would prove a serious drawback to the commercial success of his plan. Calculating the distance to Australia and back at 22,500 miles, and allowing one ton burden for every mile to be steamed, it resulted that he would require a vessel of 22,500 tons burden for his purpose. This gigantic design did not dismay Mr. Russell, who expressed himself ready to take the contract for building the "monster ship," and perfecting a design which, for boldness and originality, eclipsed every previous achievement in naval architecture.

Two important questions suggest themselves to almost every mind respecting Mr. Brunel's plan. In the first place, how is the proper proportioning strength and power suitable for the greatly-increased dimensions of the ship to be obtained? and next, by what contrivance is such a prodigious mass of inert matter to be carried from the stocks into the water? These and every other difficulty incident to his novel design appear to have been considered and provided for by Mr. Brunel, as shall presently be shown; and we now look forward to the successful launching of this leviathan ship as the inauguration of a new era in the science of shipbuilding and steam navigation which will tend not only to the commercial prosperity of this country, but to the advancement of civilisation in the remotest quarters of the globe.

A project emanating from such a source was certain to find coincidence with the public, and the magnitude of the idea was only equalled by the spirit with which the enterprise was supported by the commercial interests of the country. People had not forgotten how twenty years ago Mr. Brunel made a bold stride in opposition to the opinion of some "learned doctors" when he designed the Great Western, and increased her dimensions by thirty feet in length and eight feet in breadth over the largest paddle-wheel steamer then afloat. It was prophesied that she would "break her back" on the ridge of one of the mountainous waves of the Atlantic, or "go down end foremost" in a heavy sea—neither of which distressing casualties, we need scarcely say, befel the doomed ship, which crossed the Atlantic eighty-four times in the space of six years with perfect safety. Experience has confirmed the soundness of Mr. Brunel's scientific theories, as will be seen by the progressive size and power of our steam-ships during the last few years. We can compare the Great Western, 240 feet in length by 57 feet in width, with the British Queen, 275 feet in length by 61 feet in width; the latter with the Great Britain, 322 feet by 51 feet; the Great Britain with the Himalaya, 370 feet by 43 feet, or the Persia, 390 feet by 45 feet; and these with the Great Eastern, which measures 691 feet by 83 feet, being nearly three times the length of the Great Western—the giant of 1838 having become the pigmy of 1857.

The construction of the leviathan steam-ship having been finally determined on by the Great Eastern Company, according to the design of Mr. Brunel, a convenient site for the undertaking was selected on the eastern shore of the Thames, near Millwall, adjacent to the works of Messrs. J. Scott Russell and Co., by whom the contract for building the ship, and also for the paddle-engines, was taken. The screw-engines have been supplied by Messrs. Watt and Co., of Birmingham (for it is intended that the means of propulsion of this immense floating mass shall combine the powers of the paddle, screw, and sail). The preparation of the ground for sustaining the enormous weight to be placed upon it was in itself a work of great labour: piles were driven to an immense depth in the earth; workshops, forges, foundries, and ateliers for the various descendants of Tubal Cain were erected, and on the 1st of May, 1854, the building of the leviathan ship commenced, on the lines laid down by Mr. Scott Russell.

And now having cleared the way for the introduction of the "great fact" itself, we will ask our readers to accompany us in a visit to the "monster," whose huge bulk has so long attracted the attention and curiosity of voyagers on the Thames between Greenwich and London.

Two routes present themselves to the enterprising traveller. He may either take the Greenwich steamer, and land at Millwall; or penetrate to the Isle of Dogs by means of the Blackwall Railway, stopping at Limehouse, through whose tarry and fishy streets -narrow and ill constructed as those of an old Continental town he will be conveyed by a single-horse omnibus to the building-yard, a distance of a mile and a half, subject to the accident of another vehicle coming in a contrary direction, which completely bars the right of way, until one or other of the litigants backs out of the difficulty. During the settlement of the question a numerous attendance of the idle population, who appear to be on the watch for these entertaining stoppages, take a lively interest in the discussion, and indulge in a variety of playful remarks on the outside passengers of the omnibus. Should it happen to be high water, you stand a chance of being again brought to a sudden check at the swing-bridge of the canal while some lubberly craft is being hauled in or out of the basin, with a contempt of alacrity perfectly irritating to the impatient visitor. Altogether, therefore, we recommend every one who has not practised patience at a German rollkaus to walk from the station to Millwall, although we cannot promise, like the Guide Books, that "the picturesque scenery of the neighbourhood will charm every lover of nature;" indeed, we are bound to confess that those marshy fields, sparsely studded with stunted limes and poplars, muddy ditches, with here and there a meditative cow cropping the coarse herbage, are not suggestive of the sublime or beautiful, and that the "monster ship" is the only lion of which the Isle of Dogs has ever been enabled to boast.

Approaching Millwall from the river, whence we obtain the most perfect view of the ship, the stranger will only be struck by the singularity of a long massive block, which at first might be mistaken for a fortress erected on the low shore for the defence of Millwall and Poplar—a conjecture to which the regular rows of metal plates forming the sheathing of the ship, and which, previous to the ship's sides being painted a bright red colour, looked not unlike courses of masonry, gave probability. There is no beauty of form in the huge black structure, that, like one of the Pyramids, seems destined to last through ages, and finally to crumble away under the slow hand of time on the spot where it stands. His first surprise is to learn that the seeming fortress is a ship.

"Impossible! that immense mass, which looks like one side of Russell-square set down on the margin of the Thames, can never be a ship."

"It is, nevertheless, quite true, and perfectly possible. That is the Great Eastern steam-ship!" replies some obliging cicerone.

"Ridiculous folly! Englishmen, I know, will jump into any mad scheme. But when this huge monster is completed how will she be launched? It seems that the clever projectors forgot to provide for that important operation; for I'm hanged if they have not built her broadside parallel with the water! Ha! ha! ha! ha! Pretty engineers, to build a vessel that can never be floated!"

"My good friend, pray reserve your judgment until we have examined the matter more closely. Here are boats alongside will take us to Millwall in a few moments: step into one, and we will go on board the 'monster.'"

As the rapid strokes of the rowers lessen the distance between us and the huge structure her form becomes more distinct, and presently we can perceive the stern iron wall flowing into graceful curves and beautiful lines fore and aft, while her enormous proportions, gradually filling the eye, absorb in their magnitude every lesser and neighbouring object. Standing in the broad shadow of the mighty ship, and looking upwards to her deck some sixty feet from the ground, we feel an overwhelming sense of man's corporeal insignificance, mingled with a proud consciousness of his mental power—such as we experienced when for the first time we stood beneath the dome of St. Paul's. Wonder for some minutes fixes us to the spot; and it is not until we have made a circuit of the ship—a distance equal to a walk round Berkeley-square—that we can realise in our mind the complete grandeur of the design. Some idea of the magnitude of the structure may be formed when our readers are told that the length of the ship between two plumblines dropped over her bow and stern is nearly the length of the river front of the Houses of Parliament, exclusive of the towers at the eastern and western extremities of the façade.

Everywhere, within, without, and around the gigantic hull, a busy multitude of human ants are toiling to accomplish this wonder of modern art. But where are the sturdy shipwrights chopping and dubbing with hatchet and adze, piercing the stout oak with innumerable wounds, and driving tough treenails home with lusty blows? We miss the grateful odour of pitch and tar, and the pleasant pastime of clambering over piles of crooked timbers, and kicking to and fro the bright chips which lie scattered around like ocean shells on the sea-shore. The familiar sounds of the saw and plane are unheard, but instead of these a clangour and stuns the ear: gusts of smoke and steam from furnaces and engines assail the nostrils; and as in the enchanted Eastern city where everything was turned into stone, here everything appears to be changed into iron. The very workmen have iron frames and metallic voices; and we can almost fancy, when the bell rings for dinner, the fifteen hundred swarthy sons of Vulcan, who are daily employed on the work, being fed, like so many furnaces, with rations of the best anthracite coal. Enter now with us the workshops of the establishment, and witness how steam in a hundred different ways does the work of man with a hundredfold power; observe how with mighty arm it planes and polishes and turns those immense plates and shafts of iron; see how it bends and bites and rends bolts and bars of the same metal; with what celerity it punches those rivet-holes in the metal plates, some of them an inch thick, which are to form the outer sheathing of the leviathan ship. Truly, the age of iron is an age of wonder!

Retracing our steps through the yard, we stop to admire the immense boilers which are lying ready to be hoisted into their respective places in the ship. There are ten of them, each large enough, if the steam-tubes were taken out, for a snug breakfast party. Four of these boilers will be applied to the paddle-engines, which will have a nominal power of 1200 horses. These are, however, inferior to the engines intended for the screw, which are calculated to equal the force of 1000 horses, and are the largest ever constructed for marine purposes. The paddle-wheels, fifty-six feet in diameter—larger than the circus at Astley's—are constructed on an ingenious plan, by which, when the vessel is fully loaded, and the paddles are immersed deeply in the water, the paddles may be shortened, and the radius of the wheel reduced 10 feet. The screw-propeller—a most important agent in steam navigation—is in itself a wonder of mechanical skill and power. Let the reader fancy an enormous metal shaft, 24 feet in diameter and 200 feet in length from the screw engine to the propeller, moving an enormous screw 24 feet in diameter, the blades or fans of which, being separate iron castings fixed in the "boss" or axis, may in case of injury be removed and replaced with comparatively little trouble.

Let us now prepare to scale the iron fortress, and mount to the lofty deck by the help of those zigzag flights of steps—a feat which, if not quite so laborious as the ascent of Mont Blanc, may at least compare with that of mounting to the roof of the Colosseum. It is only here that the spectator can fully comprehend the magnitude of the structure. Standing at either end of the vessel, he sees a flush or level deck as wide as Pall-mall (exclusive of the paddle-boxes), and an eighth of a mile in length, on which a regiment of infantry could manœuvre with the utmost ease; or, if laid out for a racecourse—the Derby distance would be accomplished in three and a half round. Looking from her deck towards the Thames, large ships appear diminished to the size of their jolly-boats; nor is this surprising when we consider that the Great Eastern is six times as large as the Duke of Wellington line-of-battle ship, and that she could carry, when loaded, 22,500 tons, with accommodation for 4000 passengers and 10,000 troops. Immediately beneath the ship we perceive some extensive operations going forward. These are the preparations for launching the "mighty monster," by means of an inclined floor or plane, consisting of massive piles driven into the gravel, with longitudinal timbers attached and cross timbers over those, with a thick bed of concrete underneath—down which, at a gradient of one in twelve, the ship, propelled by hydraulic power, will glide broadside, in a cradle, into the Thames, a distance of 260 feet. The contractors for this portion of the undertaking are Messrs. Tredwell, of Gloucester. The engineers are sanguine in the success of this mode of launching, and no less confident in the application of a principle entirely new in naval architecture, by which the strength and safety of the ship will be secured beyond that of vessels constructed in the ordinary manner. Besides the safeguards mentioned, Mr. Brunel has applied a most ingenious principle for strengthening the vessel: this consists of two iron tunnels, constructed on the plan of the Menai tubular bridge, running longitudinally through the ship, which, besides giving extraordinary firmness and rigidity to the structure, are applicable to the useful purposes of steam and water pipes.

The ship will have four decks, and twenty ports on the lower deck to receive her cargo, &c., besides sixty ports on each side for ventilation. She will carry six masts, of which number five will be of iron, and one (the mizenmast) of wood, in consequence of the disturbance which iron in close proximity to the compass would produce in that instrument. It has not been yet decided where the compass will be placed; but some ingenious plans have been submitted to the company for hanging it beyond the influence of the iron.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR "Isthmian games," as Lord Palmerston was pleased to call the Epsom races, have been for the metropolitans, and for a large portion of the provincial population, the topic of the week. This time the Derby day was an unexceptionable one, and thousands who returned home in dry clothes contrasted it with the treacherous afternoon of the same national celebration in 1856, when, the race having been run, the station. On Wednesday the weather was all that could be desired to make this "May meeting" a holiday. The honours of the day descended upon the two most uncouthly-named animals on the card—Blink Bonny and Black Tommy—and Sir Robert Peel has yet to earn the blue ribbon of the turf.

The Derby day and her Majesty's birthday have interrupted the sittings of Parliament. Important measures are, however, making progress. The Divorce Bill has been elaborately discussed in the Lords, both on second reading and in committee. The Government has been successful in defeating what may be called, without offence, the professional hostility of a minority of the episcopal bench, and also the Opposition led by the Duke of Norfolk as the representative of the Roman Catholic views of the "sacrament" of marriage. Whatever talent was to be found in the antagonists of the bill, or in their arguments, was among the ecclesiastical members of the Upper Chamber; the lay opponents of the bill being, with slight exception, noblemen whose statesmanship has by no means secured the confidence of the nation, or even its recognition. Modifications, or, rather, additions, have been forced upon the bill—one of them being a clause, introduced by Lord St. Leonards, for improving the position of a married woman separated from her husband, whose interference with her property is prevented; and the other a clause carried, by a small majority, by the Bishop of Oxford, for preventing the person who has betrayed a wife into guilt from making the reparation of marrying her after her divorce. This latter clause will, in all probability, be expunged in the course of the measure through the House of Commons.

The bill enabling Government to transport offenders sentenced to penal servitude has passed the Lower House, which has therefore recorded its conviction of the necessity of a recurrence to the old system. On the other hand, demonstrations have been made in the City, and elsewhere, in favour of some scheme which shall render the labour of the convict available to society. It may be feared, however, from the diminished attendance at the later City meetings on the subject, that Mr. Pearson and the promoters of this plan have received little other support than that which curiosity and a lightly-held opinion that the subject is important have brought, and that so great a social problem fails at present to enlist the attention it deserves.

The Maynooth question, which, though an infliction upon the Liberal side of the House, was far more gravely disagreeable to numerous members on the other, has this year been disposed of in a summary and sensible manner. The Warwickshire Luther—no Mr. Spooner has been preposterously called—delivered his habitual oration, in which much that was abstractedly true was blended with propositions illogical enough for Exeter Hall; and his appeal to the House to disturb the arrangement which such enemies of the Church and Constitution as Pitt and Peel had sanctioned was then silently met by a vote. His motion was rejected; and perhaps his alter ego, the goodnatured Mr. Newdegate, who protested against so rapid a decision on the ground that numbers of new members had Maynoothian theories to propound, made the House additionally thankful that it had been taken by the forelock. The Maynooth question, and some others, have now been debated so often, and every conceivable point has been so well raised, that whenever they come on again a hint should be borrowed from the practice of the law courts, and a form of proposition should be agreed upon, and on this the verdict should at once be taken.

Sir Benjamin Hall's reception of the Marylebone magnates (whose unhappy belief that their vestry spouting is exactly the same thing, and entitled to the same respect, as House of Commons' debate, has become an infatuation) has afforded amusement and satisfaction to the public at large. These Marylebone guardians, sluggish enough while their duties had to be performed, roused into extra-parochial energy when they received an intimation that those duties must be attended to, or the Board to whom the Legislature has assigned the task of making parish officials mind their business would step in. The Marylebone Eleusis instantly organised a deputation to Sir Benjamin Hall, and came clamouring to him to demand his interference to prevent the Poor-law Board from proceeding. Sir Benjamin received their complaints very calmly, and pointed out to them that the way in which they had treated their pauper lunatics, and permitted female paupers to be flogged, had established a prima facie case against them, which must be done away with before he could become their advocate. Bah! The Marylebone guardians did not want his opinion about lunatics and flogging, they had not come to him to hear themselves lectured, and what they demanded was his distinct undertaking to help them against the Poor-law Board. The First Commissioner of Works was adamant—he reiterated his statement; and all that the vestry orators could extort from him was a promise that, if he found them in earnest trying to amend the state of affairs of which the Board had complained, he would endeavour to get them let alone. The idea of a parish like Marylebone being compelled to submit to the dictatorship of such a body as these guardians is a little too outrageous, and the sooner these garrulous and loudtongued tradesmen get to their business for which they are put in office the better. Sir Benjamin Hall, luckily, is a man about as little likely to be frightened by "spouting" as the captain of a North-Sea whaler.

Some public acknowledgment besides that of unqualified admiration on the part of all who are admitted to the noble Reading-room at the Museum is due to Mr. Panizzi for having originated and perseveringly carried out the idea which has given London the finest bookroom in the world. The 360,000 people who passed through the magnificent chamber, when first opened, can speak of its grandeur and beauty; and the students who have since occupied its chairs can add their testimony to the thoughtfulness which has made every conceivable provision for their comfort. We do not, of course, for a moment forget the merits of the architect, whose fame may rest for ages on the foundations that support that light yet majestic dome—henceforth one of the sights of the metropolis. But there is no doubt that but for Mr. Panizzi's determined energy the room would never have been reared. Anywhere but in England recognition and honours would instantly have been his reward; but—as he is neither a blundering officer of title, nor a millionaire who has enriched himself, no matter how—orders and coronets are, of course, out of his way. But, in an age when the captain of a Ramsgate steamer can hardly escape a testimonial and address for his gallant conduct off the Nore, and a churchwarden who has had the church windows new leaded is sure of a teaservice for his wife, one would think that the reading public of England, for whom Mr. Panizzi has devised the most splendid and commodious reading-hall in the world, might manage to signify to that gentleman that they appreciate his labours. The homage might be all the more gracious, seeing that an infinite amount of claptrap grumbling has at various times been discharged at Mr. Panizzi, because he has compelled those liable to contribute to the library to keep it complete, and because a catalogue, into which those who have talked nonsense about it probably never looked, has not been arranged in a form which will enable the uneducated to find a novel at a moment's notice. London at this moment owes Mr. Panizzi a double debt, and we should be glad to see a movement made for liquidating it.

THE COURT.

The Court remains at Osborne in anticipation of the visit of his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia, who is almost hourly expected to land on our shores.

Her Majesty will, after receiving the Grand Duke in the Isle of Wight, come to London on Tuesday next, inaugurating the season by a Drawingroom at St. James's Palace on the following Thursday. It is understood the Grand Duke Constantine will not visit London.

On the 9th proximo the Court will go to Windsor Castle for the Ascot race week, and returning thence, after a brief séjour, the Queen will give a series of magnificent entertainments in London, in the following order:—

June 12. Her Majesty's first Levee. June 19. Her Majesty's first State Concert. June 23. Her Majesty's second Drawingroom. June 24. Her Majesty's first State Ball. July 3. Her Majesty's second State Concert. July 9. Her Majesty's second State Ball.

The birthday of her Majesty was kept privately this year; the additions to the Royal circle being confined to the Duchess of Kent and the Prince of Leiningen.

The arrival of his Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Prussia is expected almost immediately.

Lady Macdonald and the Hon. Caroline Cavendish have succeeded the Duchess of Atholl and the Hon. Mary Bulteel as Lady and Maid of Honour in Waiting to her Majesty.

FASHIONABLE ENTERTAINMENTS.

The Countess d'Appony's assembly at Chandos House, the residence of the Austrian Embassy, on Monday evening, was very fully and fashionably attended. His Serene Highness the Hereditary Prince of Saxe-Meiningen, their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar, and Prince Troubetzkoi, were among the early arrivals.

The Countess Spencer held her first assembly this season, on Wednesday night, at Spencer House. All the magnificent saloons of this fine old residence were thrown open and brilliantly illuminated, and not less than five hundred fashionables were present.

The Countess of Dunraven gave a ball on Tuesday evening at the family mansion, in Belgrave-square. His Royal Highness the Hereditary Prince of Saxe-Meiningen honoured the festivity with his presence, arriving about eleven o'clock. Their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess Edward of Saxe-Weimar were also among the early arrivals.

The Countess de Palmerston had a brilliant assembly on Saturday evening at Cambridge House. The guests began to arrive shortly after ten o'clock, and it was nearly midnight before the carriages ceased to set down company.

His Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief has hired for twelve months Clevering Hall, Suffolk, the property of Mr. Andrew Arcedeckne, late High Sheriff of the county.

His Serene Highness the Hereditary Prince of Saxe Meiningen has arrived in Portland-place, on a visit to his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar.

The Duchess Dowager de Grammont has arrived in Hyde Park-place, from Italy, on a visit to her relative, Mr. Mackinnon, M.P.

CELEBRATION OF HER MAJESTY'S BIRTHDAY.—On Sunday last her Majesty the Queen completed her thirty-eighth year, but the celebration of the anniversary was deferred until Tuesday. It was observed as a holiday by a large number of persons in the metropolis, business being suspended in most of the Government offices, while many of the leading merchants and traders in the City closed their warehouses, in order that the persons in their employ might take advantage of the holiday. Nearly all the railways runing out of London provided excursion trains for the most attractive places along their lines. At eight o'clock in the morning the Royal standard was hoisted at the Tower, Somerset House, the Admiralty, and at the Royal parish churches of St Martin-in-the-fields, St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster, and St. Mary Abbott's, Kensington. At ten o'clock his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, the General Commanding-in-Chief, inspected the Guards on the Parade in St. James's Park. The troops went through a variety of evolutions in the presence of an immense assemblage of persons who were attracted to the Park. The guns of the Tower and in St. James's Parks, were fired at the usual periods during the day. Extensive preparations had been made for the illuminations. The clubs were brilliantly lighted up, and some elegant transparencies were exhibited in St. James's-street, New Bond-street, Pallmall, and Piccadilly. Her Majesty's tradesmen, according to annual custom, dined together in the evening. State dinners were given on the occasion by the Archbishop of York, Viscount Palmerston and many of the leading Ministers, the Duke of Wellington, and others.—At Woolwich the commanding officers of the various regiments assembled their forces on the Common, and they were paraded in honour of the anniversary of her Majesty's birthday. At Chatham the day was celebrated by an inspection of the whole of the troops of the garrison, 8000 in number. At Portsmouth the naval and military ceremonies attendant upon the celebration of her Majesty's birthday were performed with unusual effect. In the three towns of Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport, the day was celebrated in every department. At Sheerness all the ships and vessels in port bearing pendants dressed ship; the Waterloo, Cumberland, Formidable, and Edinburgh, firing the customary salutes. The same was also dressed ship. At Liverpool, and indeed at all the principal towns in the kingdom, the auspicious event was also welcomed with more than wonted zeal and loyalty.

MARRIAGES IN HIGH LIFE.—The marriage of the Earl of Stradbroke with Mrs. Bonham, widow of the late Colonel Bonham, took place on Tuesday last.—The marriage of his Excellency Mr. Buchanan, her Majesty's Minister at Copenhagen, only son of Mr. and Lady Janet Buchanan, of Craigend Castle, N.B., to the Hon. Georgiana Stuart, daughter of the Dowager Lady Blantyre, was solemnised on Wednesday.—The marriage of the Hon. Rachel Irby, eldest daughter of Lord and Lady Boston, with Mr. Augustus A. Vansittart, youngest son of the late General Vansittart, of Bisham Abbey, Berks, was solemnised on Tuesday, at St. Paul's Church, Knightsbridge. The Lord Bishop of Oxford, assisted by the Hon. and Rev. R. Liddell, performed the ceremony.—The marriage of Miss Palmer, only daughter of Sir Roger Palmer, with Mr. Archibald Peel, younger son of General and Lady Alice Peel, took place on Monday, at St George's Church, Hanover-square, in the presence of a very large circle of the friends of both families.

VISIT OF THE QUEEN TO BERLIN.—A letter from Berlin, in the Débats, says:—"It is expected that Queen Victoria will come to this capital towards the end of the summer. It is said that her Majesty has promised the Prince of Prussia to visit him at Coblentz, and it is thought that on that occasion she will continue her journey to Berlin."

THE band of the HORSE GUARDS commenced to play in Kensington-gardens, Hyde-park, on Tuesday; and will continue for the season, weather permitting, every Tuesday and Friday.

ON Monday next the foundation-stone of the Clock and Watch Makers' Asylum will be laid, at Colney Hatch, by T. S. Bowcombe, Esq., M.P., assisted by W. COX, Esq., M.P., and a large attendance of influential gentlemen.

MR. BARING was re-elected for Falmouth, on Wednesday, without opposition.

MR. HENRY SINGER KEATING, M.P. for Reading, has been appointed her Majesty's Solicitor-General, in the room of Mr. Stuart Wortley, whose ill health has caused him to resign that appointment.

VISA OF PASSPORTS IN FRANCE.—We are sorry to learn from a correspondent that a statement in this Journal of the 9th inst., to the effect that "the French Minister of the Interior had ordered the suppression of the visa of passports for all travellers," is incorrect.

THE CIRCUITS OF THE JUDGES.—On Thursday morning the Judges met in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and proceeded to choose their circuits for the assizes which will be held after the present term. The following is the result:—Home—The Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Justice Willes. Oxford—Barons Martin and Bramwell. Western Justices Coleridge and Crompton. Northern—Barons Watson and Channell. South Wales—Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, South Wales—Mr. Justice Crowder. Norfolk—Lord Campbell and Mr. Justice Williams. Midland Mr. Justices Cresswell and Erle. Mr. Justice Wightman will remain in London, and attend to the business to be transacted at chambers.

THE ATLANTIC SUBMARINE CABLE.—Mr. W. Brown, M.P., Chairman of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, Mr. Brett and Mr. Pickering, Directors, accompanied by Captain Kelk, have been on board the noble ship Niagara, Captain Hudson, at Gravesend, to confer and arrange with him about laying down that portion of the submarine cable which is to go to the western coast of Ireland, from the Valentia Bay to Newfoundland, permanently, we trust, in harmony and peace. After going through the ship, it was found that, without ruining her by cutting away stanchions, there was not space to make sufficiently large circular coils of the cable to secure its safe delivery into the ocean, which, in such an enterprise, is the first point to be attended to. Captain Hudson stated that his orders from the Secretary of the Navy were to do everything in his power to forward the enterprise, and that he, his officers, and crew felt a deep interest in it, and were ready to do anything that would contribute to its triumphant success. It was felt by all parties that, probably, the best thing that could now be done was for the Niagara to take on board the shore end of the cable, and lead the van of that part of the squadron going to the Western World, and be ready to give every necessary assistance. In this suggestion Captain Hudson most cheerfully acquiesced.

GREAT GLOBE, LEICESTER-SQUARE.—The new Diorama of India is just completed and opened. It is exhibited at twelve and six o'clock; and the Diorama of Russia at three and eight o'clock.

MUSIC.

THE two ITALIAN THEATRES are going on too well at present to give much novelty. It is only when the public appetite gets palled that managers find it necessary to stimulate it by fresh dainties. The only thing lately done in this way by Her Majesty's Theatre has been to get up the "Trovatore," as a counter-attraction to the performance of that piece at the Royal Italian Opera. It was first performed by Mr. Lumley's company on Saturday evening last, with complete—indeed triumphant—success. The house was crowded with the fashionable world, and the reception of the opera was literally enthusiastic. Indeed the performance was the most brilliant and complete that has taken place this season. Giuglini, high as he had already raised himself in the favour of the public, now raised himself still higher. He had to contend with the formidable rivalry of Mario, whose Manrico is one of his finest parts; but emulation seems to have excited him to his utmost efforts, and the result was a performance, different from Mario's, but scarcely inferior. The character of Manrico is chivalrous and warlike; and Giuglini, who has been hitherto characterised more by beauty than power, more by tenderness than force, in this character assumed quite a new aspect. He was full of fire and energy; while his voice, without losing its mellow sweetness, often rang through the theatre like the sound of a trumpet. Alboni, in the character of the gipsy-woman Azucena, is unrivalled—a circumstance the more remarkable, as, before she appeared in it, she had never shown any remarkable powers as a tragedian; but when she assumed the character in Paris, after Viardot, she eclipsed even that great actress. The picture of the gipsy—wild, stern, vindictive, yet full of more than a mother's love for the youth whom she has nurtured—is perfect in every feature; and it is as pathetic as it is terrible. It is a masterpiece of dramatic art; while its effect is heightened by the exquisite beauty and finish of her vocal execution. Mdlle. Spezia has never appeared to such advantage or achieved such success as in the character of Leonora. This opera belongs to the school of music with which she is most familiar; and she threw much beauty and interest into the character by her beauty, grace, and feeling. Beneventano's Count de Luna was, on the whole, a good performance; but the part was somewhat over-acted, and his singing lacked somewhat of the polish of Graziani's at the other house. On the whole the rival performances may be deemed equal in merit, and we shall probably see the extraordinary circumstance of two of Verdi's operas being the prominent objects of attention at our two Italian theatres for the remainder of the season.

Tuesday next is fixed for the début of Signor Corsi, the celebrated barytone, at Her Majesty's Theatre. A new tenor, Belart, has arrived from Florence, where the admirable manner in which he sustained the tenor parts in the "Sonnambula" and "Pirata" led to his engagement for the following Carnival at Florence, and for this season in London.

A young prima donna, Mdlle. Parepa, made her début on Thursday (last week), at the Lyceum, in the "Puritani." She possesses some Continental reputation, and her singing was that of an accomplished artist. She acted, too, with intelligence and feeling; but her powers are not of the highest class, though she may make herself a valuable member of the company. Another début, at the same house, was that of Miss Balfe, in the "Sonnambula," on Thursday last. We must defer till next week our account of her reception.

THE COLOGNE CHORAL UNION—the band of amateur choristers from the Rhenish city—whose two previous visits to this country must be fresh in the memory of our musical readers, have revisited us a third time, and have been giving concerts every day during the past week at the Hanover-square Rooms. These performances, it is announced, will be continued all next week. They are attended, as they were before, by crowded and applauding audiences, and well deserve the favour they meet with; for the singing of this choir is something to which in this country there is no parallel. Their pieces are of a simple and popular kind—nothing remarkable in point of composition, but deriving an inexpressible charm from the mingled power and sweetness, the delicacy, precision, and purity of intonation, with which they are sung. Our English chorus-singers would do well to attend these concerts by way of lesson—to learn what wonderful results may be obtained by laborious and persevering practice, animated by true enthusiasm and love of art.

On Monday a matinée musicale was given at Willis's Rooms, by Mr. W. G. Cusins, the distinguished young composer and pianist. He was assisted by Miss Dolby, Herr Reichardt, Madame Weiss, M. Sainton, Mr. R. Blagrove, and Mr. Harold Thomas; and a selection of classical music, vocal and instrumental, was admirably performed. The room was crowded.—On Tuesday evening Miss Stabbach gave her annual concert at the Hanover-square Rooms, which were filled with fashionable company. Miss Stabbach's own performances were warmly and deservedly applauded, and the whole entertainment was elegant and pleasing.

THE THEATRES, &c.

HAYMARKET.—On Monday Sheridan's excellent comedy of "The Rivals" was admirably played. The company has greatly improved. Mr. Compton's Sir Anthony and Mr. Farren in Captain Absolute were competent representatives of the two characters. A more frequent representation of sterling English comedies would still further bring out the merits of these and other performers. This fine drama was succeeded by a light vaudeville from the French, under the title of "My Son Diana," and indebted to the "Monsieur, votre Fille," by MM. Mark Michel and Labiche, for its plot and part of its dialogue. The charm of the piece, such as it is, consists of Miss Oliver appearing in male attire, and Mr. Buckstone's awkwardness in wooing her while in such costume. The motive for this peculiarity is the whim of her father, a retired grocer, who, pluming himself on his military propensities, has determined to educate his daughter in the masculine and coarse manner than is the feminine graces. Diana can hunt, swim, shoot, but not sew or practise any other female accomplishment. On her suitor objecting by letter to her costume, she threatens him next day with a whipping; but, observing him in a flirtation with her cousin, jealousy takes the place of wrath, and reveals the existence of womanly feeling. The change thus begun leads on to a reconciliation, and the lady is accepted by her lover on condition of her rejecting for ever the shooting-jacket with its objectionable continuations. The performance was perfectly successful.

ST. JAMES'S.—On Monday a change took place in the performances at this theatre. The Bouffes Parisiens commenced the evening with a little drama called "La Nuit Blanche," in which the old incident of a lover being concealed by a guilty wife on the arrival of her husband is repeated. In this instance, however, the intruder is an officer of the Customs, and the husband is a smuggler. In the cellar in which he is hidden the former discovers a store of contraband goods, and this gives him an obvious advantage over the smuggler, who is only too happy to compromise matters. An opera, entitled "La Bonne d'Enfant," followed, in which an amorous nurserymaid brings her little charge into danger of being used by one of her lovers as an instrument for dashing out the brains of the other. These two worthies are a chimney-sweeper and a sapper; and the former, just before the crisis described, descends by the chimney, while the latter enters by the window. Mischief, however, is prevented by the timely arrival of the master of the house. Of such slight materials are these very amusing pieces composed. A very pretty fairy tale, produced on Friday, under the title of "Les Fantins de Violette," was withdrawn, in consequence of the indisposition of M. Pradeau; but repeated on Wednesday, with the addition of a piece called "Le Duel de Benjamin."

THE PRINCESS ROYAL'S PORTRAIT.—The portrait of the Princess Royal given in the Illustrated London News of last week, from a fine photograph taken at Osborne by Mr Mayall, of Regent-street. The portrait of Mr. C. W. P. Bentinck, M.P., in our last issue was also from a photograph by Mayall.

CORRIGENDUM.—Among the Parliamentary portraits published in our Number for May 17 was one of Mr. Miles, M.P. for Somerset, from a photograph by Mayall. By mistake it was described as "Mr. Arthur Mills, M.P. for Taunton."

THE ARCHER TESTIMONIAL.—We perceive that an attempt is in progress to raise a testimonial in honour of the late Mr F. Scott Archer, the inventor of the collodion process in photography. Mr. Archer has left a wife and children unprovided for, and, as the testimonial in this instance takes a benevolent form, we earnest recommend it to the support of all who have either derived pleasure or profit from this most beautiful and wonderful process, which has given the means of occupation and livelihood to many hundreds of his fellow-creatures.

TOWN AND TABLE TALK ON LITERATURE, ART, &c.

SIXTY-THREE years after the death of his illustrious father, death has removed from among us the eldest son of Robert Burns. Of the three sons of the great poet (two, we are glad to think, still survive), Robert, we are informed from those who knew Burns, was the most like his father. We recollect seeing him many years ago, and thought then how much he resembled the best portrait of his father—that engraved by Beugo, in 1787, for the Edinburgh edition of Burns's poems. His face (in this respect unlike his father's) was, when unenlivened by conversation, a little heavy, but, when roused—and roused we saw him—his eyes had the true lamp-like lustre of the father, and his whole face beamed with intelligence. He had a fine relish for poetry, and wrote some half-dozen songs that smack not a little of the true Burns flavour. At his father's death, in 1796, he was a mere boy; he indeed barely remembered his father. But his taste for poetry was not his sole inheritance from his illustrious sire. He had a heavy portion as well of the impulsive passions of his father. He was a clerk for many years in the Stamp-office, London; and his father's name, as it was the means of his obtaining the appointment, was on many occasions the only reason assigned for his being suffered to retain it. When, in 1835, he sought retirement—or rather was advised to retire—the sole reason assigned by the Lord of the Treasury, and in writing, for his receiving a pension, was the genius of his father. This, it is said, was the act of Lord Monteagle—then Mr. Spring Rice. We relate thus much about him because the sons of Burns are public property—made so by the genius of their father, and by the noble poem which Wordsworth addressed to them.

Who would not be a successful author? or, rather, who would not be a successful authoress? On Wednesday last the copyright of Miss Strickland's "Lives of the Queens of England" sold by auction for £6900! Unhappily, the lady herself receives not a farthing of this increase in the marketable value of her work. Miss Strickland parted with her copyright for the sum of £2000. Still she must feel a noble kind of pride of this public appreciation of her labours in pounds sterling. What will Lord Campbell do? Is there truth in the rumour that he is about to estimate by public auction his nine octavo volumes of the "Lives of the Lord Chancellors and Lord Justices." Will his Lordship—to use an American expression—realise as much as the spinster lady? Miss Strickland—who complains of his Lordship's literary larcenies on a large scale will, doubtless, say "no." Mr. Murray (Lord Campbell's publisher)—what will he say?

"Somebody" is collecting Prince Albert's speeches, and the Society of Arts, it is said, is about to publish them "uniform" with "Pitt's Speeches" and "Enfield's Speaker." This is a piece of literary news. There is a yet another piece. Another "somebody" has settled with a West-end house not far from Albemarle-street for a new edition of Disraeli's "Quarrels of Authors," and is to include a supplemental volume (if one volume will contain the whole) of the "Quarrels of the Napiers," in which most particularly, and by particular desire, William, descended from the Logarithms of that ilk, will play at bowls and "civil dudgeon" with Perceval, Ostram, Willoughby, and nobody but a Napier know how many champions in Gog and Magog suits of questionable quality and make.

There was a good meeting at the Literary Fund dinner. All our friends—publishers, booksellers, bookbinders, stationers, and stitchers—mustered to support "Granville the polite." But "Granville the polite" did not take the chair, and the task fell to a Cowper, who managed to do pretty well. His was a Cowper's chair, not a Cowper's sofa. By the way, how is it that, while Mr. Dickens delights in knocking down the Literary Fund, Mr. Thackeray delights as heartily in supporting it? The great author of "Pickwick" and "David Copperfield" expresses everywhere in his manly language a hearty hatred of the Literary Fund as at present managed—the great author of "Vanity Fair" finds words as manly to express his hearty liking of the Fund as at present managed. Is not Mr. Dickens right, and Mr. Thackeray only ingenious?

The three saloons at Manchester intrusted to Mr. Scharf have been happily described—we believe by Mr. Scharf himself, who is a humorist in his way—as the Spirit, the Flesh, and the Milliner. We must confess that in his first saloon, which somebody called "Virginia," he is very spiritual and un-Manchester-like; that in his second he is as rude as Prince Vortigern:—

> A painted vext Prince Vortigern had on,
> Which from a naked Pict his grandaire won.

And that in his third saloon (C) he is in the ruff, cloak, petticoat, and small-clothes line. "Hoo are ye getting on wi' th' Exhibition?" said an elderly lady fresh from the banks of the Tweed to a Scotch cousin a few years younger. "Oh, gaily," was the reply; "I hae nearly done wi' my A B C." Mr. Scharf's saloons are numbered by the first three letters of the alphabet.

Fools who will rush into print are cawing clamorously against the judges appointed to report on the designs for the new public offices. There is the old Bute cry of too many Scotch on the committee. But is the cry just? The "bold Buccleuch," over whose property the public offices are likely to extend, is surely a proper man (when we remember his engineering skill) to be heard publicly on such a point. Mr. David Roberts is as certainty a proper nomination when we remember his practical turn of mind and his pictorial taste. Mr. Burn is an architect known for scientific skill from John o' Groat's to the Land's End. The late Speaker is scarcely a very fit man to represent public wants in public offices. Yes—and we express the judgments of the best men—the Public Offices Committee is a good Committee.

HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN is about to visit England, and to accept the hospitalities of Mr. Charles Dickens. A new work of Andersen, quaintly entitled "To Be, or Not to Be," will appropriately make its appearance in a few days.

NEW SOCIETY OF FEMALE ARTISTS.—A society has been set on foot with the object of collecting the works of female artists into an exhibition for sale. This exhibition will open on the 1st of June, and will comprise, along with the productions of painters by profession, some contributions from amateurs, not a few of which are understood to possess distinguished merit.

BARON MAROCHETTI is at present engaged on a colossal monument to the Duke of Wellington, which will be raised in St. Paul's, if the design meets the approval of the Government.

CRICKET.—A match was played in the Grange Court cricket ground at Chigwell, on Saturday last, between eleven of the Rev. Mr. Earle's school and eleven of the resident gentry of Chigwell, and terminated in favour of the school by ten wickets.

TOY BALLOONS.—The Charivari has discovered what it considers a useful employment of the little balloons with which children have been amusing themselves of late. A gentleman and lady are represented walking out in the country during the hot season. The former takes off his coat and hat, and fixes them on the balloon, which he then allows to ascend some distance above his head, where it remains stationary, being held by the string, and forms a protection against the rays of the sun. The lady does the same with her shawl and bonnet, and so avoids the necessity of carrying a sunshade.

THE general census of Spain and its adjacent isles was taken on the 21st inst.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE race meetings for next week are—Redditch and Cartmel, on Monday; Epping Town, on Tuesday; Manchester, on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday; Wye and Coggeshall, on Wednesday; Southwell, on Thursday; and Hawick, on Friday.

Eight Collingwood yearlings, and six mares of Sir John Shelley, will be sold at Tattersall's on Monday, as well as some of the Earl of Chesterfield's hunters and racers; and Lord Strathmore's eleven hunters, including the noted Abd-el-Kader. On Wednesday Mr. Tattersall will be at Middle Park, near Blackheath, disposing of Mr. Blenkiron's yearlings, thirteen of which are by Kingston. Mr. Milward's ponies sold well on Monday; but Mr. Newton's yearling, half-brother to Poodle, only fetched 220 guineas. In fact, there is but little prospect of very high prices for blood yearlings this season. The reverse of the remark applies to the hunter market, which is unusually brisk. Seventy of them last week averaged 305 guineas at the hammer; and the sale of Mr. A. Thomson's crack horse, Maximus, by Cotherstone (who carried him so splendidly in the Claydon's Wood run last season), for 560 guineas, to the Earl of Stamford, is the best that has been known for many a year.

The only water fixture of importance is the Royal Thames Yacht Club sailing match (first and second classes) from Erith to the Nore and back, on Tuesday.

Cricket will be lord of all in the Londoners' minds, as the great match for the benefit of the Cricketers' Fund between the A.E.E. and the U.A.E.E. begins on Monday, at Lord's. Anderson, Bickley, J. Cæsar, Crossland, Clarke, Diver, Jackson, G. Parr, Stephenson, Tinley, and Willsher play on the side of the former, against Bell, Caffyn, Dean, Grundy, Hunt, Lockyer, Lillywhite, Mortlock, Martingell, Wright, and Wisden.

THE DERBY DAY.

EPSOM has seldom had a more crowded or, barring the dust, a more auspicious day for its fête, but still very little popular enthusiasm attended it. In fact, there were such a number of favourites, who kept ruthlessly "knocking-out" each other to the last, that the public got bewildered, and thought wildly on the subject. There seemed to be no champion of the million as in The Dutchman's, Voltigeur's, Wild Dayrell's, or "The West's" year, for whose triumph every one, except the unhappy "sweet" knights who were in opposition, longed, as part and parcel of the pleasure of the day. Lord Zetland, it is true, Lad Skirmisher; but the cockneys did not back him with so much zest, both from the knowledge that Job Marson would not have the mount, and from a well-founded notion that, with all his wonderful staying powers, he did not, perhaps, possess a sufficiently high turn of speed to enable him to finish over so short a course. Still, he kept a steady lead in the betting till Saturday, when "le plus grand speculateur" support of his horse, and reports of Danebury trials, brought Anton to the fore, and, in spite of his Two Thousand failure, many were will to back the elegant little bay. After a great deal of negotiation, mystification, and trouble, the Saunterer "difficulty" was settled; and Tournament's brush with Blue Jacket, on Monday, was pronounced so good, independently of the measure which had been taken of him by Zadée, that he forthwith became first favourite, Saunterer, Anton, and Skirmisher following him in succession—the last named at about 9 to 1. The latest betting quotations were—Tournament at 4, Skirmisher, Saunterer, and Two Thousand failure, many were will to back the elegant little bay. After a great deal of negotiation, mystification, and trouble, the Saunterer "difficulty" was settled; and Tournament's brush with Blue Jacket, on Monday, was pronounced so good, independently of the measure which had been taken of him by Zadée, that he forthwith became first favourite, Saunterer, Anton, and Skirmisher following him in succession—the last named at about 9 to 1. The latest betting quotations were—Tournament at 4, Skirmisher, Saunterer, and M.D. at 7, and Arsenal and Anton at 9 to 1; while Blink Bonny came at last from 50 to 20 to 1, as remembrances of her old powers, and the feeling that the stable had a rare line through Strathnaver made many rue and try to get out.

The weather was enormously hot, and, to judge from the ground and the backward state of the verdure, Epsom has had but little share of the recent showers. We have seldom known the course harder, and many a trainer felt quite as much genuine dismay at the prospect before him as John Scott did in West Australian's year. Bandages seemed the rule rather than the exception. Although the crowd, both on the hill and the stand, looked quite equal if not superior to the "Exhibition year," there seemed to us a falling off in the company in the paddock. Sam Rogers had no horse, and watched the race from his pony on the hill; and Bartholomew was merely in attendance, helping to saddle Scott's horses, as the chance of his riding under 9 st. again is quite gone by. Contrary to expectation, Scott started a couple—one of them, Bird-in-the-hand, a very handsome-looking chestnut. William Day brought out the same number, and had also taken advantage of the warm weather to waste for Glee-singer, the winner of the Newmarket Stakes, but the latter did not appear likely to reward his loyalty, and Ackworth, his companion, was a narrow melancholy specimen of the Simoom blood. Zuyder Zee, on the contrary, who had a strong private party, was decidedly one of the best looking horses in the race, with great Cup attributes from the most about him—in fact, one of the most muscular sons that old Barbelle has ever had. M. D. was like a massive coachee, and Saunterer seemed as beautiful as ever, the beau-ideal of a clever little black hunter with a very bloody head and neck. Still he did not look fully prepared, and John Osborne's countenance was the reverse of a joyous one: he has felt the whole business not a little, and knows that he has far away the best horse at present on Middleham Moor. Skirmisher was perfection itself in point of training, and a great improvement upon his old self of last year. Arsenal was small, low, and lengthy, and with very strong quarters; and Tournament was something of the same order, but not so good behind, and his looks did not quite satisfy his backers. There was, in our eyes, no improvement in him since last year. Anton was as beautiful as ever, but still one wondered at the enthusiasm which would bear up so unceasingly for a horse with so fabulous a back, especially after the style in which he had "died" to Vedette in their Newmarket joust. Adamas was the animal on whom all Epsom had pinned their hopes, from the house of Heathcote down to the very policemen, who took care, from the most interested of motives, that none of the forty-and-one louts who have kept ceaseless watch and ward for weeks past should get near him. Although he has not grown at all, and quite merits the name of "our little horse," there was not a more perfect and more blood-like animal in the race, and his reported half owner, Will Day, who has completely outgrown his "tiny" dimensions, looked quite a giant on him. All the horse's green-meat look had disappeared, and we do not think that any of his competitors showed in such perfect form. Blink Bonny, who attracted only slender notice, looked just as she did last year, and was completely packed up before she left the paddock for the second time. Black Tommy was also scarcely observed, owing to the uniform ill-luck of the "white and scarlet seams," but he seemed a well-grown and rather short horse, with a nice head and neck, and not exactly the animal to lay 200 to 1 against in cold blood.

After the usual preliminary and long parade in the paddock, the thirty were dismissed through the little gate, formed in line under the palings, and then wheeled round into the "fatal glen." Then came a sad quarter of an hour's suspense, in which some eight false starts (owing, as the crowd seemed to think, to Holmes on Leander) were effected. Both flags, however, went down at last, and the lot streamed away, with Chevalier d'Industrie in advance. His labour was soon over, as after the first three hundred yards the cherry jacket of Gaberlunzie was seen in his place, and leading the ruck slowly on to the mile-post, where Alfred Day took Anton to the front, and a shout arose that he was going to try and cut them all down. The pace was rather very steady than very fast, Blink Bonny and M.D. lying well up, and Adamas, owing to a bad start, very far in the rear. Anton kept his lead round the turn, where Lambourn went up and raced with him, and the chestnut and M.D. seemed determined to give an account of him, Alfred Day drawing his horse together, and reserving something to finish with. Lambourn dropped off near the road, and shortly afterwards M.D. broke down, and he and Sim "were seen no more." At this point Strathnaver, with his fair friend Blink Bonny watching him, took his turn at Anton, Charlton being very handy on the top side, and Arsenal and Black Tommy going well at his side. At Tattenham-corner, Wells had begun to make up his ground, but until near the post he never could get into terms with his horses. Once there, he went up on the low side with one of the gamest and most brilliant rushes we ever saw; but although Anton, Arsenal, and Strathnaver succumbed to it, he could never quite reach Blink Bonny; and the mare, very carefully ridden by Charlton, won in good style by a neck, while Adamas lost second place by a head to Black Tommy. Strathnaver was only a neck behind him, and then came Anton and Arsenal, fifth and sixth, beaten only a very short distance. In fact, the finish between the six was so close that no one on the hill seemed to have an idea of the result till the mammoth 21 was hoisted, and even then many only saw the 2 part of it; and it was buzzed about that the other name, Lady Hawthorne, had been fortune's favourite. The enthusiasm for the winner was only of a very limited kind, as her inexplicable Newmarket running had left a sting in people's memories. Ellington's defeats were as nothing in comparison with this; and every one vowed she was a rorarer to boot. The stakes amount to £6886, and thus Mr. I'Anson is amply compensated for his refusal to sell his mare for 6000 guineas in the winter. Yorkshire could hardly believe the news when it was flashed along the wires, and fully thought it was a hoax. It is said, however, that he is not her owner.

Charlton's luck was of the most remarkable kind. Baron Rothschild had been so dissatisfied with his riding of Sydney in the TwoThousand that he requested him "to send his cap and jacket in," and the result was that Sydney ran nowhere in D. Hughes's hands, and the indifferent potentate got the winning mount. As he won the Oaks on Mincemeat in 1854, Charlton has now completed his Epsom degree. Although Deception was near it, this is the only time, save and excepting Eleanor's year (1851), that the Derby has ever been won by a mare. Luck has always been so dead against them that only two out of the 208 entries were of that sex. The winner (whose style of going was very much admired) seems very little grown or improved since last Autumn, and is in the Great Yorkshire Stakes and St. Leger, in both of which ignoramus is a very formidable foe. Skirmisher did not show well, but he must not be despised on that account for the Ascot Cup. We are inclined to think that the whole lot are most moderate; and the feeling among all the jockeys was that, independent of that allowed fact, the adamantine ground would level countless distinctions of form, and that any of them might come back a winner. As the sequel proved, they were not far wrong. Sir Robert Peel is said to have dropped a tremendous stake, as he never ceased backing his horse for a place, which he just failed to obtain. We believe that Mr. I'Anson has not got a great amount beyond the stakes, and, owing to the impossibility of "getting out," his mare was a bad one for the Ring, while Mr. Drinkald would have won £27,000 and "Mr. Mellish" £30,000 if either Black Tommy or Adamas had done the deed. The running of the latter horse with the winner and Skirmisher was exactly in accordance with their Doncaster form. Still he beat all the favourites; and, although he has never been higher in the betting than 100 to 6, it is quite on the cards that, with a better start, his "blue hoops" would have first caught the judge's eye, and all Epsom made supremely happy, as in their little Amato's year. Tournament had no chance throughout; and the Saunterer mystery, which has caused so much unpleasantness both to John Osborne and the Ring, had an equally ignominious solution, though the black has better days to come. The following is the return of the running:—

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.—The opening trip of this distinguished club took place on Saturday last, when a large party of leading yachtsmen were present. The rendezvous was Blackwall, and at two in the afternoon there were nearly twenty yachts at and about the station. They all backed at Gravesend, and a large party sat down to dinner at Wates's Hotel—Lord Alfred Paget presiding. The customary loyal and other toasts, all duly acknowledged, wound up the business of the evening.

RANELAGH YACHT CLUB.—The first above-bridge match of the season took place on Monday for a handsome silver cup and cover, given by the above club. The weather being very fine, and a steamer being provided for the occasion, a very large party of ladies and gentlemen congregated to witness the match

LONDON MODEL YACHT CLUB.—A very pretty little match among the models belonging to the London Model Yacht Club came off on Monday, on the Serpentine river, Hyde-park. The race was for a valuable silver cup and a money prize.

FATAL BOAT RACE.—On Saturday evening last a young man, named Godwin Mewton, aged 21, lost his life whilst engaged in a boat race. He had agreed to row against a fellow-clerk from Westminster to Blackfriars-bridge for 8s. On approaching Blackfriars, Mewton was considerably ahead of his competitor, reaching the bridge, the ebb tide being very strong, he had some difficulty in rounding his boat, and at the same moment the swell of the Lotus steamer sent the water into his boat, and washed off one of the sculls. In his attempt to reach it the boat capsized, and before assistance could be rendered the poor fellow sank and perished.

TRIAL TRIP OF THE SCREW STEAM-SHIP "OTTAWA."—The Peninsular and Oriental Company's new screw steam ship Ottawa returned to Southampton on Wednesday from Cherbourg, to which port she had made a trial trip, having on board some of the managing directors of the company. During the passage the ship behaved admirably, and attained a speed of nearly 12 knots per hour under steam and canvas, with a strong current against her. Her machinery was so perfect that no trouble whatever was experienced from the heating of bearings or any other cause. The tonnage of the Ottawa is 1274. She is barque-rigged, and can accommodate 100 passengers. Her engines are upon the direct-acting principle, with oscillating cylinders. The Ottawa originally belonged to the Canadian Steam Navigation Company. Since being purchased by the Peninsular Company she has been entirely refitted. She is intended for one of the company's stations in India.

WRECK OF THE EARL OF YARBOROUGH'S YACHT.—As the Earl of Yarborough, the Hon. W. Monson, and Dr. Duigan, R.N., were cruising in the North Sea in his Lordship's yacht Zoe, on the night of the 24th, owing to the wind falling light, the vessel drifted by the tide on to the Halsborough sandbank, about 14 miles off the coast of Norfolk. The yacht, impeded by the force of the tide, struck the bank with great violence several times, and after some little time, rolling over, became washed by the sea; sufficient time, however, elapsed to enable the noble owner and his friends, together with the crew, to betake themselves to the yawl, and, having been on the above island six days, they were taken to Cape Town by the Nimrod. The escape of the crew and passengers was truly marvellous, when it is considered that amongst the cargo was a large quantity of spirits, and 250 barrels of gunpowder (eighteen tons), some of which as they were thrown overboard were, in the words of one of the passengers, "actually hot—almost too hot to hold;" and it may be readily conceived, as he states, that "the throwing of the last barrel overboard gave great relief to all." From the time of the first alarm to the time of leaving the ship an hour had not elapsed. Her Commander (Captain Elmstone) behaved with the most admirable coolness—standing guard, and seeing the women and children first safely down to the boats, and being himself the last to leave the ill-fated vessel. Shortly after he left the flames rushed up in all directions. The Cape public have subscribed £280 for the relief of the distressed passengers.

THE IMPERIAL PARISIAN RACECOURSE AT THE BOIS DE BOULOGNE.

PARIS has created another merveille at her very gates, in the shape of a racecourse at Longchamps, in the Bois de Boulogne. Both the conception and the whole carrying out of the arrangements are due to the Emperor, who has not forgotten his old Doncaster and Ascot experiences; and the result is, that all the best features of an English racecourse have been reproduced here, in the midst of scenery which even Goodwood could not despise.

The courses consist of two well-turfed oblongs one, one mile and three quarters, and the other, one and a quarter mile, round, with a straight run in of about half a mile. The stands are superior to those of Chantilly; and the Imperial one is placed between that of the Jockey Club and the Ring, which are each flanked in their turn by a larger one for general spectators. Saddling-boxes and stalls have not arisen as yet, but a space is allotted behind the stands for the horses to saddle in. This Imperial coup was opened on Sunday, April 26th, but the state of the weather, which was bitterly cold and snowy, did not admit of the Emperor and Empress honouring it with their presence. The first race was a Prix de l'Empereur, added to a sweepstakes of 100 fr. each, and was won by M Lupin's Eclaireur by Mr Wagg, which by Kitchener was well known in England as the Duke of Beaufort's high weight, and won the Chester Cup for his Grace on Red Deer, in 1844, at four stone. The other four jockeys in the race were all Englishmen. Although they begin to race earlier in the Midi, the "real season" will in future date from the first of these Parisian meetings.

The accompanying View of this Imperial course was sketched during the recent visit of the Grand Duke Constantine of Russia.

COUNTRY NEWS.

SUNDAY PROMENADES AT WINDSOR CASTLE.—The Sunday promenades on the grand parterre, Windsor Castle, commenced on Sunday last when the Band of the Royal Horse Guards (Blue) played for the first time this season, from four till seven o'clock in the evening. Never were the terrace and ground de in such fine order as at the present time—the ornamental shrubs in the park paths and slopes being dressed in their gayest tints. The bed in the grand parterre has been filled with flowers under the native station and vases have been carefully renovated and placed on new ornamental pedestals. The north terrace has also the addition of the bell from Sebastopol, and two Chinese cannon of beautiful workmanship; and the cannon which has been used to thunder from the north side as a present to Her Majesty, will soon be joined there.

REVIEW OF THE ROYAL HORSE GUARDS (BLUE) AT WINDSOR.—On Saturday (to-day) a grand review takes place, in Windsor Great Park, of the Royal Horse Guards under the command of Colonel the Hon Cecil Forester, when his Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and other distinguished personages, will be present.

OPENING OF CATTHORPE PARK, BIRMINGHAM.—Great preparations are in progress for opening Cattlerope park, Birmingham, on Monday next. On that day, it is intended will be opened as a general holiday. Beside the large space which is situated on the Pershore road it is presented by Lord Calthorpe as a recreation ground and promenade for the working classes, and admirably adapted for the objects contemplated. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge visits Birmingham on the occasion, and has undertaken to perform the ceremony of inauguration. In the evening his Royal Highness will be entertained by the Mayor at dinner.

HALF-HOLIDAY AND DINNER TO MR. INGRAM'S WORKMEN AT RICKMANSWORTH.—We extract from the Buckinghamshire Advertiser a few particulars of one of those reunions so instrumental in producing good feeling between the different classes of society, for which the distinctions of wealth and station form a wide and ample employer and employed: "Saturday was a memorable day for the great family of man. On Saturday at the request of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS gave another evidence of the liberality and sympathy with the men employed at its paper mills, at Rickmansworth, in allowing them to leave work at one o'clock and meet together at Rickmansworth, for the purpose of engaging games at cricket, quoits, and other healthful out-door exercise. The games were commenced with vigour until nearly seven o'clock, when they were signalled to beat their retreat to the Swan Inn, where a substantial dinner had been provided for them, at which seventy persons sat down to. The meeting presided over by Mr. Lindsay, M.P., Mr. Black M.P., Mr. Mark Lemon, &c. After the justice had been done to the eatables, and the cloth removed, the customary loyal and patriotic toasts were given and warmly responded to. Mr. Lindsay, in addressing the company, said he was one of the hardy sons of toil. He ridiculed the notion frequently entertained that any one who rose from the ranks was born with a silver spoon in his mouth—the silver spoon or the wooden one was got by industry. The eminence which their employer, Mr. Ingram, had gained might be obtained by them. Mr. Black congratulated the men upon the harmony which existed at the meeting, as gave another proof of the relative position of master and workmen, and showed that neither could go on successfully without the other. Workmen were as necessary in their sphere as the higher classes should be as much respected: they were all so many links in the chain. The health of the chairman the founder of the feast—was given amid great cheering. In acknowledging the toast, he said he had asked them together to enjoy themselves as some little return for their performance of duties. He had reason to acknowledge their worth, and felt gratified to meet them. The working population had always given him satisfaction, and it was a pleasure when he was adding to their comfort. Several other toasts were given and acknowledged. Some excellent songs were sung during the evening, and everything passed off with spirit and to the gratification of all."

THIRSK, MALTON, AND COCKERMOUTH RAILWAY.—This project is virtually abandoned, although the arrangements negotiated between Mr Hornsey on the part of Sir Hedworth Williamson and the directors of the Eastern Counties Railway Company are not finally cancelled.

HOP INTELLIGENCE.—The tenor of communications from the several hop growing districts in Kent and Sussex is similar. The recent burning days were though not sufficiently heavy to penetrate the parched ground deeply, have done a most beneficial service to the grounds. In Mid Kent the appearance of the bine is satisfactory, the plants presenting a long and regular growth, while the quantity of vermin does not appear unusually heavy. Strong winds have, however, occasioned much damage, and in some few districts the fly is reported to be making its appearance. The hop is now rapidly progressing towards the bines in some of the early gardens having nearly topped the poles.

THE RESTORATION OF WORCESTER CATHEDRAL is being proceeded with as rapidly as possible for the purpose of the approaching musical festival; and it is stated that £6000 will have been expended when it is completed.

ENORMOUS LOBSTER.—On Monday evening, the 18th instant, a lobster, two feet six inches in length, and weighing ten pounds, was caught in the Bath harbour by Mr. Alexander, while setn the harbour-boat with a party of visitors on board. The lobster became dead and wounded his head with his snout, before being secured.—North and South Shields Gazette.

THREATENING THE DUCHESS OF KENT.—At the West Bromwich Petty Sessions on Saturday last John Wardle, a collier, was again placed in the dock, charged with sending the following threatening letter to the Duchess of Kent:—

> To the Right Honourable Sir George Gray I wish you would be so kind as to weight to the Duches of Kent and ask her if she will be so kind as send me five hundred Pound and I will trust to her honour to me to be just I do not wish to be in a hurry as late as to-day as I am by the 21 or it will be too late I remain your humble servent till death.
> JOHN WARDLE, Hanger-lane

Colonel Bagot, chief constable of Staffordshire, stated that the prisoner had previously addressed an letter to her Majesty. Caleb Haycock, bag from the Home Office, stated that he had seen other letters in the Home Office in the same handwriting, and in the name of the prisoner. The magistrates ordered the prisoner to be bound over to keep the peace for twelve months, he entering into a recognizance of £20, and finding co-sureties for the same sum from two substantial householders.

THE TYNDRUM COLLIERY EXPLOSION.—The inquest on the 189 sufferers by this explosion was brought to a close on Friday, the 22nd inst., when, after an elaborate summing up by the Coroner of the eleven days' evidence, the jury returned a verdict to the effect that Abraham Turner, the leader, and the next two survivors to the fire, the effects consequent upon an explosion of carbureted hydrogen gas; that in the immediate cause of such explosion there is not any conclusive or sufficient evidence to show with the jury do not think any charge of criminal negligence, they, however, express their opinion that the discipline and the non-observance of the rules allowed by the manager and his deputies." Every exertion being made for the recovery of the remaining bodies, and for the restoration of the mine. From the evidence of the engineers employed to explore the pit it appears that the set of naked lights instead of safety lamps was the proximate cause of this explosion, as also of the other two frightful explosions which occurred in the immediate neighbourhood before, at the Darn Main and Oaks collieries, some few years ago. It is estimated that the explosion will entail an expense of from £12,000 to £16,000 on the proprietors, apart from the loss of interest on capital.

DEATH FROM SUCKING LUCIFER MATCHES.—On Monday an inquest was held at Oban, on the body of the body of Joseph Morris, aged two years and a half, who met with his death by sucking the composition from lucifer matches.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

THE dealings in Home Stocks for money this week have not been to any excessive but, as they have gradually increased, the market has assumed more firmness, and a slight improvement has been made in the quotations. The Government broker has invested £30 000 daily in Exchequer Bills, at the value of those securities has continued firm.

Advices from Paris state that the stock of bullion in the Bank of France has increased nearly £600,000 since the last returns were published; and we are likewise informed that some large parcels of gold have been lately forwarded to the United States in payment for corn. French account; nevertheless, we continue to draw large supplies of silver both from France and Germany in exchange for gold

The returns of the Board of Trade for the past month exhibit favourable results, even though the increase of the shipments is not equal to March when compared with last year. The following figures show the value of the exports during the first four months of the present and two previous years —

About £138,000 in silver has reached us from the Continent this week From Russia, £50,000; from Constantinople, £70,000; and from New York, £37 000—have come to hand in gold.

The Bank of England has purchased £150,000 bar gold for the Continent, and £190,000 has been shipped to South America, the Cape, &c. We have no relaxation to notice in the rates of discount; it being almost impossible to obtain accommodation at a lower rate than under the Bank minimum; and the demand for money, though not excessive, has been tolerably active. The advices just at hand from India and China show no important change in the commercial position, and it is supposed that the next packet will carry out £600,000 in silver.

The English Stock Market on Monday was rather inactive; but the fluctuations in the quotations were trifling. Consols for money left off at 92¾ ⅞; Consols for Money, 93⅛ ⅜; Ditto for Account, 93¼ ⅜. New Three per Cents. left off 92¾. Bank Stock was 213½. India Stock, 252. India Bonds were 69 pm. Exchequer Bills, 3s to 1s pm. Long Annuities, Bonds, 9 and 8. On Tuesday the dealings were limited, as follows: Bank Stock, 213½ to 212. Three per Cents Reduced 92¾ ⅞. Three per Cent Consols, 93⅛ ⅜; New Three per Cents, 93¼ ⅜; New Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 77¼; Long Annuities, 1885, 18 1-16; India Stock, 220 to 222; India Bonds, 4s. dis.; Consols for Account, 93⅛ ⅜; Exchequer Bills at par to 1s pm. Bank Stock was 212 to 213. Three per Cents Reduced were 92⅞ ⅜; Three per Cent Consols, 93⅛ ⅜; Consols for Account, 93⅛ ⅜; New Three per Cents, 92¾ to 93; New Two-and-a-Half per Cents, 77¼; Long Annuities, 18 1-16; India Stock, 220 to 222; India Bonds, 4s to par. Exchequer Bills 3s to 2s pm. Ditto Advertised, 1s to 2s pm. On Thursday the Consol Market was steady, yet towards the close of business prices were rather drooping, notwithstanding that the Directors of the Bank of England made no change in the value of money. The Three per Cents for Transfer, were 93¼ ⅜; for Account 93⅛ to 93⅜; the New Three were 92¾ ⅞, and the Reduced, 92⅞ to 93⅛. Bank Stock, 213½; India Stock, 221½; March Exchequer Bills, 48 to 49 pm.; Advertised ditto, 3s to 4s pm.

Generally speaking the Foreign Houses have ruled steady, and the quotations have been well supported. The transactions for money, however, have been only moderate. Brazilian Five per Cents, 103; Chilian Six per Cents, 112; Mexican Three per Cents, 22½; Peruvian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 76½; Portuguese Three per Cents, 46; Russian Five per Cents, 105; Russian Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 96½; Sardinian Five per Cents, 91; Spanish New Three per Cents, 41¼ to 42; Spanish New Deferred, 25¾; Turkish Six per Cents, 84⅞; Turkish Four per Cents, 101¼; French Four-and-a-Half per Cents, 91 fr.; French Three per Cents, 69 fr. 25 c.; Belgian, Four-and-Half per Cents, 97; Ditto, Two-and-a-Half-per Cents, 57½; Dutch Four per Cents, 97⅞. Joint-Stock Bank Shares have been in good demand. Australasia have realised 87½; Bank of Egypt, 16⅞; City, 62; London and County, 29¾; London and Westminster, 44; National Bank, 35¾; Oriental 40½; Ottoman, 14¾. Provincial of Ireland, 30; South Australian, 29; Western of London, 24¾.

In Miscellaneous Securities very little has been passing. LAYING OF THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE TRADESMEN'S AND MECHANICS' INSTITUTION, NORTH SHIELDS.

THE ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the Tradesmen's and Mechanics' Institution, Howard-street, North Shields was performed by W. S. Lindsay, Esq., M.P. for the borough of Tynemouth, on Tuesday evening (last week), shortly after six o'clock. The hour fixed was three o'clock in the afternoon; but, in consequence of the hon. member having lost the mail train from London on Monday evening, it was postponed until his arrival by the express train at six o'clock.

Tea was served to about 600 persons, previous to the foundation-stone being laid, in the Albion Assembly-rooms. Meanwhile Mr. Lindsay arrived at the railway station, where he was met by some gentlemen connected with the institution and a band of music, and accompanied to the Townhall. Shortly afterwards he was joined by the Committee of the Institution, the Mayor and Corporation of Tynemouth, the Mayor and Corporation of South Shields, and the Mayor of Newcastle. They then proceeded in procession to the site of the intended edifice. The procession was headed by a band of music, followed by the Mayors of Tynemouth, South Shields, and Newcastle; W. S. Lindsay, Esq., M.P.; Ralph Ward Jackson, Esq.; Corporations of Tynemouth and South Shields, members of the Committee, and many of the principal inhabitants of the town. The site of the new institution was decorated with numerous flags. A large crowd of spectators were assembled on the ground and in its vicinity.

As soon as the procession had reached its destination, the various persons composing it formed in a circle round the foundation-stone, and, a prayer having been said by the Rev. Mr. Thompson, senior Curate of Christ Church, Mr. T. Fenwick (borough surveyor) placed a brass box, containing the following record, engrossed upon vellum, together with copies of the North and South Shields Gazette, and Daily Telegraphic Edition, and Shields Advertiser, and a number of coins of the reign of her present Majesty, in a cavity of the stone:—

TYNEMOUTH TRADESMEN'S AND MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

The foundation-stone of this institution was laid this day (Tuesday), the 19th day of May, A.D 1857, and in the twentieth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady the Queen by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, by William Schaw Lindsay, Esq., representative in Parliament for the borough of Tynemouth. Architect, Mr. John Johnstone. Builders, Messrs. Scott and Reed.

CEREMONY OF LAYING THE FOUNDATION-STONE OF THE TRADESMEN'S AND MECHANICS' INSTITUTION, AT NORTH SHIELDS.

This institution, founded in the year 1833, has hitherto afforded another example of the manner in which these institutions are neglected by the class for whom they were originally intended. Its members have consisted almost entirely of tradesmen and the young men connected with the shops and offices in the town; their numbers have rarely exceeded 150 or 180, and it has never attained to a higher dignity than that of a book-room. About four or five years ago several of the members determined to arouse it from this state of apathy, obtain for it a suitable and convenient building, and to attract to it, if possible, the support of the mechanics. The foundation-stone of the new building laid this day by one of its most liberal patrons is a proof that hitherto their exertions have been successful. The cost of the ground was £350, and the building is, with internal fittings, to cost about £1750. After paying for the ground there is £1250 in the bank to the credit of the institution, and the committee are very sanguine that by the time the building is completed the whole of the money will be raised. In the meantime, the institution has been brought into public notice; the members have steadily increased, and now number 260; and there are upwards of 4000 volumes of books in the library.

Then follow the names of the patrons and officers of the institution.

Mr. Tinley, President of the Institution, then presented to Mr. Lindsay, for his acceptance, a beautiful silver trowel, and requested him to lay the stone.

Mr. Lindsay thanked Mr. Tinley on behalf of the members of the institution most warmly, and said if he had done anything to forward the erection of that noble institution he had done no more than what he conceived to be his duty towards that class from which he himself had sprung, and he trusted that they would so avail themselves of the benefits such an institution was capable of conferring as to be able to rise as he had done (Applause).

The foundation-stone was then lifted upon the bed of mortar which had been prepared for it, and, Mr. Lindsay having performed the usual ceremonies, he declared, amid applause, that the stone was laid.

Mr. Lindsay afterwards mounted the stone, and proceeded shortly to address the assemblage. A short time ago he said he had the pleasure and high honour of visiting the borough to lay the foundation stone of a tabernacle to the mighty God of Jacob. He had now come among them to lay the foundation-stone of a temple of the people (Applause). It was indeed a great honour which they had conferred upon him by inviting him to lay the foundation-stone of that building. It was [illegible] pleasure and satisfaction [illegible] him to be present with them on such an occasion. He trusted that that building, the foundation-stone of which they had laid that day, might come out many who would equal even those who had gone before, the Lord Eldons and Stephensons—men great in their day and generation, and that they would emulate them in their habits of industry, which alone made men great and happy, and nations prosperous and peaceful (Applause). Much credit was due to those gentlemen who during the last twenty years had been unwearied in their exertions in raising the funds necessary for the erection of that building (Hear, hear). It was [illegible] some twenty years ago since some few indefatigable men joined together and said, "We must see if we cannot have an institution wherein the rising generation may learn instruction, and have their minds improved." Much credit was indeed due to them. By their exertions sufficient funds had been raised to complete that building the foundation-stone of which they had that day laid. His earnest prayer was that the institution would go on and prosper, and that from amongst its members might arise those who would do honour to the native town, and to the land which gave them birth (Applause).

This part of the proceedings then terminated, and the company returned to the Albion Assembly-rooms.

The new building for the above institution will be erected at the south-west corner of the intersection of Howard-street and Saville-street. On the ground-floor it is designed to have a news-room and conversation-room, placed one on each side of the principal entrance, and a large room with committee-room adjoining. A spacious stone staircase will lead to the first floor, on which the library will be placed, which will be 70 feet in length by 30 feet in width, and 22 feet high to the springing of the lead glass roof. There will also be a class-room and committee-room on this floor. Above these two rooms will be three rooms for the librarian's residence. The building, which has been designed by Mr. John Johnstone, of Newcastle, will be of brick, with dressed stone facings. The elevation, which has been much admired, is of an Italian character, and well adapted to street architecture. The contractors are Messrs. Scott and Reed, of Newcastle. The amount of the contract for completing the building is £1900. The site of ground has cost about £200. It may be expected that £500 more than the sum above stated will be required for furnishing and rendering the institution worthy of the name.

During the laying of the foundation-stone Messrs. W. and D. Downey, artists, South Shields, took several photographic views illustrative of the ceremony, from one of which the accompanying View has been engraved.

The event was celebrated by a soirée at the Albion Assembly-rooms, at which Mr. Tinley presided; and very interesting addresses were delivered by Mr. Lamb, Mr. J. Mc. Mr. R. W. Jackson, and other gentlemen, and during the evening several liberal contributions were made to the building fund of the institution.

THE MONSTER BLAST AT HOLYHEAD.

THIS great operation at the works of the Holyhead Harbour of Refuge took place on the 21st inst., and was attended with complete success. For the accompanying details of the works and the explosion we are indebted to a Correspondent.

The Holyhead Harbour is designed as a harbour of refuge for the shelter and safety of the immense number of ships frequenting the various ports on the west coast; and it is also intended to become the station for the arrival and departure of the American mail steamers, whereby a great saving of time will take place, as the mails will be in London before they could have well reached Liverpool; and there will be a saving of about twenty-four hours in the mails from America to Dublin and other parts of Ireland.

The original designs for these extensive and important works were first conceived and prepared by that late lamented and gifted engineer, J. M. Rendel (the late C.E. F.R.S., since whose recent decease Mr. Hawkshaw has been appointed to superintend their execution, and the works have now been in process of construction upwards of seven years, during which time Messrs. Rigby, of Westminster, have most energetically carried on the works, and large numbers of the American mail steamers, whereby a great saving of time will take place, as the mails will be in London before they could have well reached Liverpool; and there will be a saving of about twenty-four hours in the mails from America to Dublin and other parts of Ireland.

The original designs for these extensive and important works were first conceived and prepared by that late lamented and gifted engineer, J. M. Rendel (the late C.E. F.R.S., since whose recent decease Mr. Hawkshaw has been appointed to superintend their execution, and the works have now been in process of construction upwards of seven years, during which time Messrs. Rigby, of Westminster, have most energetically carried on the works; and large numbers of the American mail steamers, whereby a great saving of time will take place, as the mails will be in London before they could have well reached Liverpool; and there will be a saving of about twenty-four hours in the mails from America to Dublin and other parts of Ireland.

The difficulties which they have had to surmount are by no means of an ordinary kind; for the timber staging, which has first to be run out several hundred feet in a depth of from 18 to 30 feet of water, and, when once completed, is frequently carried away by storms, arise in the broad Atlantic, the waves of the accumulated force strikes the coast with terrible violence, and is fearfully destructive in its effects upon the temporary works. Upon one occasion 780 feet of staging was carried away bodily. And, when a north-west gale prevails, the blocks of stone weighing nearly twenty tons are pitched about, and when dashed against the wooden staging the damages are most extensive.

The works principally consist of an immense breakwater or pier, running out from the land, which, up to the present time, has been carried out to a length of nearly 7000 feet, and it will, probably, be extended further. The size of this breakwater is 400 feet at the base, and will be 150 feet wide on the top. The inner slopes are 1 foot base to 1 perpendicular, or an angle of 45 deg.; and the outer slopes towards the sea are between 7 feet and 8 feet base to 1 foot perpendicular; and the top of the pier will be carried up 28 feet above high-water mark.

Along the centre of the breakwater a rough wall is being built with immense blocks of stone varying from three tons to twenty tons; these blocks are lifted into their position by portable steam-cranes, of which there are a great number on the works; and large quantities of hydraulic mortar is used, composed of Aberthaw lime and Pozzolano. This central wall forms a kind of backbone or centre of resistance, without which the breakwater would be liable to be broken through. The total quantity of stone which in the breakwater will not be far short of 120 million cubic feet, or nearly ten million tons, at twelve cubic feet per ton. The surrounding rugged hills, which make Holyhead so picturesque and wild in appearance, are admirably situate for supplying such an immense quantity of stone. The quarries may safely be said to be quite inexhaustible, as the mountains rise all around to several hundred feet in height. The rock is a quartzose of varying character, occasionally chloritic, and from its hard texture and extreme massiveness it is well suited for such rough work, and will be everlastingly durable, though it is not adapted for finished masonary; but there is abundance of very fine hard-grained limestone, which is readily obtainable on the island, and with which some of the inner walls have been already built, and the breakwater will be coped. The quantity of stone which has been moved and deposited during the last six years is nearly seven million tons. The modus operandi of obtaining such a vast quantity of stone is by means of blasting. These operations and the other works are carried on by Mr. Charles Rigby, who individually directs the whole, with the efficient assistance of Mr. Reithemier, the eminent engineer who acts on behalf of Messrs. Rigby. During the past four years not less than 600 shafts and headings have been sunk and driven, and the charges of powder have varied from 1000 lb. to 18,000 lb. per charge. Eighty thousand tons of stone have been obtained, sometimes, by blasting in the day's work, and in the fine weather upwards of 25,000 tons of stone have been deposited in the sea weekly; yet not a single failure has taken place, nor an accident occurred, during the progress of the works.

In order fully of the recent extensive explosion, which is the largest that has been undertaken [illegible] one single operation, it may be stated that the [illegible] is traversed by numerous irregular veins or joints. Having ascertained the existence in a point of the mountain nearly perpendicularly over the face of the [illegible] and the quarry at a distance of about 50 feet back from the [illegible] Messrs. Rigby determined upon making an attempt at this point to displace at one time a mass of the [illegible]

The boring machine by the Messrs. Rigby was employed for a period of [illegible] months in the completion [illegible] first place, a drift was driven [illegible] level back to a distance of 40 feet; and at the end of this a shaft, 15 feet deep, was sunk, the bottom of which was a few feet below the ground on the quarry side. Along with the face of the quarry galleries were driven right and left from the bottom of the shaft to a distance of 60 feet on each side; and finally, at the end of [illegible] and at the immediate points [illegible] chambers were driven [illegible] the shaft. These chambers were [illegible] and the [illegible] were carefully filled with powder, and the two intermediate ones 4000 lb. each—in all, 18,000 lb. of gunpowder.

Another drift was also made in the face of the rock, making a fifth chamber, and which was about 100 feet to the left of the other chambers, and, though not connected with them, was nevertheless intended to be exploded, and to act simultaneously with the other mines, which was done. This chamber had 8000 lb. of gunpowder, making an aggregate of 21,000 lb., or nine tons—an amount of explosive material that has very rarely been exploded at any one time previously, and the power of which can be but very imperfectly imagined.

As soon as the powder had all been placed and deposited, and the copper wires fixed in the respective mines, the various chambers and galleries were carefully packed with clay and stones well rammed down to the very mouth of the headings. The length of the fuse intended to be acted upon was about 250 feet, and the height of the projection 120 feet: whilst the grip of the explosion was estimated at [illegible] from the face of the quarry, at which distance the joint in the mountain occurred, and was visible. The explosive power of the gunpowder used is tested from time to time, and its effects on the rock varies with its [illegible] but it averages from five to six tons of rock displaced per pound of powder, the highest power being obtained when the rock is favourably stratified. The entire force of the powder used on the recent occasion had been calculated to displace 130,000 tons of material—an amount which, if it had to be removed by manual labour, would require an incredible number of workmen. The test for the strength of the powder used is seven degrees on the Government segment approbator, but the practical mode adopted for testing the powder on the works is by charging an 8-inch mortar with 12 oz. of powder and a 68-lb shot, which is fired at an elevation of 45 degrees, and should send the shot 500 feet. This is called the mortar approbator.

The galvanic arrangements for discharging the mines was by means of a 40-called Grove's wet battery, each cell being charged with one pint of nitric and two pints of diluted sulphuric acid, the quantity of water being 7 to 1 of acid. Owing to the damp state of the weather the proportion of acid was slightly increased. The position of the battery was on the hill above the quarry, at a distance of 200 feet from the face of the scar, or cliff. The length of each wire was 450 feet, measured from the battery up to the chambers in the mines. There was, consequently, 4500 feet of copper wire used, which is only partly new, and the dimensions of which is considerable. The cost of the battery alone is only £9.

On approaching the works the scene of activity was very striking, and highly interesting both to practical and scientific men, and to general visitors. Numerous gangs of workmen, filled with masses of stone, were seen running on self-acting inclines towards the breakwater or returning empty to the quarries for a fresh load, and passing backward by small light locomotives, not more than fifteen tons in weight, but dragging incredible loads compared with their small dimensions. The gauge of the various lines is seven feet—being the width best adapted for tipping the stone through the bottom of the waggons.

There are also a great number of moveable cranes in use upon all parts of the works, and excellent arrangements for preparing the piles; and last, not least, houses for the temporary wants of the workmen, and soup kitchens to minister to their creature comforts—the number of workmen being generally upwards of 1000.

The varied works in progress strike the visitor with astonishment; the tremendous gash made in the mountain side gives a very impressive idea of the amount of work done, and the gigantic appliance that must have been brought into operation to effect this work. The continued explosion of small mines every few minutes resembles the discharging of heavy artillery, which, with the crash of falling masses, must be rather alarming to elderly ladies and people of weak nerves.

When the whole of the works are finally completed, including some similar ones on the other side of the bay, they will form an immense and spacious harbour of 800 acres in area, and in which shelter will be available for some thousands of vessels, from the largest steamer, including the Great Eastern, to the small fishing-smack, and it will also be a protection to the whole of the Holyhead roadstead, which spreads out for many square miles.

The wet weather of the day previous to the explosion doubtless prevented many persons being present at this extraordinary operation. Though the London and North Western and other railroad companies allowed every facility at reduced fares, a great number of gentlemen arrived in Holyhead over night, so that the excellent and extensive accommodations of the Royal Hotel were quite taken up. The morning trains also brought in a great number of visitors, the day having broken fine, though a little rain fell towards the middle of it; before twelve o'clock a great concourse of people had collected upon the works, a large number being civil and military engineers, contractors, and other scientific and practical gentlemen; and, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, there was also a very large number of ladies present. Amongst the visitors were Sir Charles Fox, Messrs. H. L. Gisborne, Rvde (from the Carragh Camp), Mr. Hawkshaw (the chief engineer to the works), Mr. Dobson and Mrs Dobson, Alderman Ross, Archdeacon Jones and ladies, Chancellor Trevor and a party of ladies, Captain Skinner and Mrs. Skinner, and a party of ladies; Mr. Antrobus, Mr. Rawlins, Mr. Macneil, Captain Shaw, R.E., with a party of Lieutenants and Students from Woolwich, the latter having spent a few days there. Messrs. J. and C. Rigby were also present to superintend the arrangements, and to make the necessary preparations for the safety and accommodation of their numerous visitors.

Mr. Charles Rigby and Mr. Reithemier having gone carefully round to inspect for the last time the battery and other arrangements, and having seen that all was right, the signal was given, and the two twelve o'clock bell was rung for warning off the workmen, it being their dinner-hour; the remaining half hour was spent in passing round signals to caution the visitors, who were crowding about the works, to betake themselves to a safe distance. At twenty minutes to twelve seen collected around in the neighbouring heights, the height immediately opposite the face to be exploded being favoured with the greatest number, for there the best view was obtainable, and it was at the safe distance of about a mile and a half. At length the bell had become finer, and the flying of a large number of signal and other flags, with the numerous crowd, gave the works quite a gay and lively appearance. A conspicuous white flag had been soon hoisted for several days at the quarry, which shortly disappeared, and several small red ones were hoisted at various points as preconcerted signals, and at half-past twelve o'clock, exactly, a large red flag was hoisted with the word "Fire," when a signal gun was discharged, and then ensued a moment of great anxious and curious spectators there was a moment of breathless suspense. It was but for a moment, for in the next there was seen the heaving forth of the vast powerful mass of the earth beneath had suddenly sunk from under it, and then a huge avalanche of rock and stone was heard falling with a terrific crash to the base of the precipice in front, and with no other perceptible sound than what was heard of that terrific wreck of matter. The spectators set up a hearty round of cheers at the termination of the explosion, and then rushed forward to the spot to see the effects. Close to the battery the shock felt was like that of an earthquake; the framework of the wooden hut built for the batteries was visibly shaken, and some portions of stone were heard to fall upon the canvas roof of the hut; and those who held the wires were pulled forward a couple of paces, but let them go immediately they felt the wires moving. The whole operation was one of the most complete and gratifying description, unmarred by the smallest mishap or accident whatsoever—not a stone of that enormous mass was moved more than 400 feet from the original face of its bed. On a careful measurement of the work after the explosion it was found to have surpassed the most sanguine expectations, having gone seven feet further back into the hill, and produced about 100,000 tons of material.

A sumptuous banquet was given in the evening by Messrs. Rigby to their numerous friends and employés.

After dinner there were numerous patriotic and loyal toasts, and much good speaking, the entertainments being kept up until the time for the departure of the early train obliged the company to separate.

FAREWELL DINNER TO SIR R. HAMILTON BY THE RULER OF INDORE.—As a gratifying instance of the harmony subsisting between some of the native Princes of Central India and the East India Company, we gladly avail ourselves of the country of a correspondent in supplying a few particulars of an entertainment given by the Ruler of Indore to Sir Robert Hamilton, Bart., Agent of the Governor-General for Central India, previously to his departure from that city. Sir R. Hamilton is a distinguished officer at Bombay for a six months' leave of absence at England.—The Maharajah Tookojee Rao Holkar, Bahadoor, solicitous to express towards the worthy Baronet the high esteem in which for fourteen years he and all around them gave him a magistrate, and [illegible] their best [illegible] on the Royal guardian [illegible] He had [illegible] Sir Robert Hamilton [illegible] Welcome [illegible] in front of the palace, with a large blazing star, flanked on each side by the letter "R." The Prince expressed his obligations to Sir Robert for the services rendered to the country of Indore, including the roads from robbers, improving the thoroughfares, making bridges, and, above all, in spreading the blessings of education. Sir R. Hamilton having suitably acknowledged the honour accorded to him, the toasts were proposed and responded to. On leaving, accompanied by the Sovereign, a sudden effulgence of pyrotechnic art shone out upon Sir Robert in a "God protect you!"

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN A COAL PIT.—His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, last week, visited Houghton Pit, the property of the Earl of Durham, which he descended, and was conducted through some of the workings by Mr. Forster. The Royal party were conveyed from the bottom of the shaft down the engine plane to the workings in coal tubs, and remained in the pit about an hour and a half. The young Prince, who made frequent and pertinent inquiries of his conductors on different matters, was shown the mode of working the coal &c.

THE Bonner Zeitung states very decidedly that the Prince of Wales will spend the months of July and August at Konigswinter, and that the Hotel de l'Europe has been taken for him and his suite, which, together with the servants, numbers twenty-seven persons. The rent to be paid for these two months is said to be 12,000 thalers (£1800). The same journal informs us that the Princess Royal will also pass a month or two on the Rhine, and that the spot chosen for her Royal Highness's temporary residence is Remagen, little way further up the Rhine, above Bonn.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. F., Lyme Regis.—A player of a month's practice ought to perceive the impracticability of White's giving Mate in the way you propose. When the Knight checks at the third move what is to prevent Black taking it?

W. W., Secretary.—We hope, for the credit of the club, the game is not as fair specimen of the "two best players" club

AMATEUR.—Before taking another step make yourself master of the Chess notation adopted in the Columns of the men in this country. You will find a chapter devoted to the subject in "The Chess Player's Handbook," published by H. Bohn

W. T. RIDDLE.—Problems involving peculiar conditions of solution, such as to mate on a particular square, or with a particular piece, or with a Pawn, not one player in fifty will ever look at.

W. P. SMYTHE.—For the hundredth time at least, we repeat that a player on commencing a Pawn to his 8th square is entitled to call for another Queen, even though his original Queen should be in possession. Why do not Chess amateurs, instead of writing in a newspaper for information upon these simple matters, obtain some elementary book and learn the rules?

AN OLD PROBLEM-WEAVER. The notice of Problem Tourney alluded to by the Committee of the next meeting of "The Northern and Midland Counties Chess Association," are as follow:—1st. Each competitor must become a member of the Association by paying the small annual subscription of 5s in the hands of the Secretary, on or before the 1st of June, and the other in four moves, must be sent in by such candidate directed to the Secretary of the Association, Chess Club, Manchester, before the end of July. 3rd. The Problems must neither be what is called "confirmed" nor "suicidal." 4th. Each set of Problems must bear some motto or private signature, and be accompanied by a sealed envelope corresponding distinguished, containing duplicate copies and the name and address of the composer 5th. The prize, which will consist of a set of Chessmen of the value of £5 5s., will be examined and adjudged by a Committee appointed for that purpose by the Committee of the Association."

J. J.—Were the commonplace solution you propose of Problem No 690 correct, the composition would be worthless; but Black can easily evade mate if White play as you recommend.

PERCY.—The key move to Mr Conrad Bayne's clever stratagem, Enigma 1031, is—1. Kt from Kt 5th to Q 4th

BALBUS.—You may obtain Mr Heydebrand der Lasa's new edition of his "Leitfaden" of Messrs Williams and Norgate, the foreign booksellers. It is a very valuable little treatise on the openings. From the same source can be procured Max Lange's "Sammlung Neuer und Gelungener Partien." A capital collection of original games contested by the author against some of the best players in Germany.

(To the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.)

SIR,—With reference to the derivation of the word "mate" in Chess, lately referred to in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, it may be worth your notice that it (or at least "mat") is in use among the Tartars of Thibet and Mongolia, who are said to know the game well (Hue's "Voyage dans la Tartarie," &c., vol. ii., p. 449, 2nd Edit.) This would seem to show that the Spanish word cannot be the original root.

Your obedient servant, LYTTELTON.

THE CENTRAL HALL OF THE ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION.

THE View which has been selected of the Art-Treasures Exhibition for the present Number (pages 530-1) will serve to convey to those who have not yet visited the Exhibition a notion of the coup d'œil presented by the Nave, as it is called the "Central Hall" of the building. The length of the hall included in the engraving is 704 feet, and its width 104 feet. The space between the rows of coupled columns is 56 feet, and upon each side of the columns to the right and left to the walls on which the portraits are hung is 24 feet. The entrances shown on the right hand side conduct to the Galleries of Modern Artists, and those on the left to the Ancient Masters. The Transept is of the same width as the Nave, and it crosses at the termination of the Galleries of Ancient and Modern Masters. On each side of the organ loft, or gallery, is placed a photographic collection, and in the other portions of the gallery the Court of Engravings. The works of sculpture, arranged in the several lines shown in the engraving, include Bailly's "Eve at the Fountain;" Gibson's "Hunter," the "Ophelia" of Calder Marshall; "Eve Startled at the Sight of Death," by Hogan; "Adam and Eve," by Schuler; a "Venus," by Canova; "Euphrosyne," by Westmacott, "Venus and Cupid," by Schwanthaler; the "Narcissus," by Gibson; a charming group of "Children at Play," by Munro—the figures being admirable portraits of three of the children of Mr. Herbert Ingram, M.P.; a fine work by Wyatt, "The Nymph Preparing for the Bath;" and others, to which we shall have occasion to refer on another occasion. At different points in the hall will be seen groups of exquisite carved and inlaid furniture, rich cabinets inlaid with coloured woods, ivory, and in some cases with precious stones, or delicately-painted medallions of porcelain. Conspicuous in the collection is the buhl cabinet which formerly belonged to the Cardinal de Retz, now the property of her Majesty, and graciously lent by her for the purposes of the Exhibition. In other parts are placed several of those old coffres de mariage—large oblong coffers, profusely ornamented with the most elaborate carvings in wood; the most valuable specimen of this class being a Venetian one, now the property of Mr. Rothwell. Antique and mediæval chairs, and various articles of furniture which form part of the Soulages Collection, are also placed in this Central Hall, and form interesting objects in the Museum of Art. Passing down on the left side of the hall, the first of the large glass cases contains a valuable collection of specimens of Venetian glass—some showing all the delicacy and minuteness of the vitro di trina or lacework glass; others illustrating the vitro florito, or flowered glass, in which threads of coloured glass are introduced between the layers of white glass, and produce the most pleasing effects. And there are pieces of the famous "frosted" and "crackled" glass; and others so light in their material, so delicate in their form and outline, as almost to make us converts to the old notion that poison poured into them would cause them to break to pieces. Passing on from the glass, the case next in order filled with specimens of enamels, arranged so as to show the whole history of the art from the earliest specimens of the Cloisonné or Byzantine period to the early Limoges, the translucent, the later style of Limoges, the Grisaille, the present admirable imitations of enamel-work by Messrs. Kerr and Binns, of the Royal Worcester Works. In this case there is the celebrated drinking-cup of King John the crozier of William of Wykeham, and an enamelled horn by Courtois, which a celebrated and wealthy collector was so anxious to possess that he sent a blank cheque to its owner with permission to fill up for any sum he pleased if he would give him in return the coveted gem. Beyond the there are three cases filled with porcelain specimens of Majolica, Palissy, Chinese, Persian, Dresden, Chelsea, Wedgwood, Sèvres, and of every other country and manufactory. Next is a case filled with the glittering treasures of the goldsmith's art, the value of the specimens said to be worth a hundred thousand pounds or more. We cannot now linger to describe any of their beauties or tell their histories. Sculpture in bronze and terra-cotta fills the adjoining case, and beyond that is a collection of works in ivory which would afford materials for profitable study and examination for many visits. Knights in armour, mounted and on foot, arrest our progress westward; and, leaving this magnificent Meyrick Collection, we cross the Nave, and retracing our steps on the opposite side, pass [illegible] the cases filled with specimens of ancient jewellery and goldsmith's work contributed by Messrs. Hunt and Rundell, more armour and arms from the Tower and Windsor Collections, more ivory carvings including the whole of the wonderful Douce Collection, more of Maestro Giorgio's Majolica, Faenza, and Palissy wares, curious metal-work and specimens of glass, filling three cases, and forming part of the [illegible] Collection. We shall more again of the specimens of the [illegible] enamelled snakes, and frogs, and scorpions and [illegible] Bernard Palissy, the glorious old potter, loved to ornament his dishes. This latter case is entirely filled with the ceramic contributions of Lord Hastings. Four other cases follow, [illegible] contributions from the British Museum and Mr. [illegible] exhibiting specimens of glass, china, and enamel. We [illegible] the four Central Halls [illegible] of Kings and Queens, of warriors [illegible], of poets and philosophers [illegible] and [illegible] others of doubtful, and many of bad reputation, with [illegible] passing tribute of acknowledgment. These British worthies deserve, however, something more than a hasty nod of recognition; and on some future occasion we shall introduce the heroes and heroines of Mr. Cunningham's Portrait Gallery to public notice, with all the [illegible] due to their famous or infamous character and position.

THE SHREWSBURY CASE. The claim to the earldom of Shrewsbury, which is entirely before the House of Lords, and it will come on for hearing at the earliest possible opportunity. As the [illegible] and oldest earldom in the land, and [illegible] attached to the annual value of £40,000, it bids fair to prove an interesting [illegible] as it has many causes. The printed [illegible] asserting the claim on the part of the present Earl Talbot was laid upon the table of the Upper House on the 21st instant. It consists of forty one pages of genealogical and other matter, and is entitled "The Case of the Right Hon. Henry John Chetwynd, Lord Talbot, relating to the Earldom of Shrewsbury." Her Majesty was pleased to refer the Earl's petition, together with the Attorney General's report thereon, to the House of Peers on the 8th of May, 1857, who, on the 11th of May, referred it to the Committee of Privileges to consider and report thereon. The opponents of his Lordship's claim are three in number—first, the Duke of Norfolk, as guardian of the interests of his infant son, to whom the late Earl bequeathed his magnificent property at Alton Towers; secondly, the Princess Doria Pamphili of Rome, as only surviving child of John, sixteenth Earl; and, thirdly, Major Talbot of Castle Talbot, county Wexford, as a rival claimant to the title. Sir Roundell Palmer, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and Mr. T. E. Ellis, are the counsel for Lord Talbot. Mr. Fleming is retained for the Duke of Norfolk and Mr. Peter Burke for Major Talbot. In the event of Earl Talbot being able to establish his claim to the earldom of Shrewsbury on the extinction of the Committee of Privileges his Lordship will become premier Earl of England and also of Ireland, and the Earl of Wexford and Waterford, and then a further suit will probably have to be carried upon before the Court of Chancery for possession of the Shrewsbury estates at Alton, and other property in the counties of Stafford, Oxford, Worcester, and Berks. It can, however, the House of Lords decide in favour of the petitioner, the claim of Major Talbot will be submitted for their Lordships' consideration, that Major Talbot is true his pedigree up to [illegible] Richard, son of George, the fourth Earl, who was made a Knight of the Garter for his valiant conduct at the Battle of Stoke, on the 16th of June, 1487.

THE ISLAND OF PERIM, IN THE RED SEA. The Mauritius Gazette records the occupation by the British of the island of Perim, at the entrance of the Red Sea, and which is in the middle of the Strait of Babelmandel. The British flag was hoisted there on the 10th of February by the Company's troops, and the occupation is definitive. The island of Perim, which was first occupied in 1736, is situated between Arabia and Africa, on the very point at which the Red Sea [illegible] and it divides the strait into two channels. The passage to the east, on the side of Arabia, is only three miles wide; that to the west on the African side, is about ten or twelve. On the south-west, towards the widest entrance of all to become the great commercial road to [illegible] Asia. It is not necessary to erect any fortifications; [illegible] Aden is sufficient to supply all that may [illegible] must of Africa. On the other [illegible]

FASHIONS FOR JUNE.

SUMMER has come at last, and with it all the various out door and daylight amusements of the season. Races, flower-shows, concerts, &c., now follow closely one upon another, and London appears under its most brilliant aspect. The parks and other places of fashionable resort are radiant with lustrous silks of every colour of the rainbow, and the ladies' bonnets are adorned with every flower that the parterre or the greenhouse can furnish.

For out-door dresses of silk, double jupes, flounces, or side trimmings (in the style called quilles) are all equally fashionable. Black lace is employed in the side trimmings of silk dresses, whether of dark or light hues, and nothing can be richer or more effective. Fringe and passementerie, of various kinds, are also much employed. Ruches, either of silk or ribbon, have a very light and pretty effect for trimming double skirts. A row of very broad fringe, headed by several rows of velvet, either black or coloured, forms a fashionable style of trimming for a dress with a double skirt. It must be borne in mind that the trimming should be placed on the upper skirt only, the lower one being usually quite plain.

For walking dresses striped and chequered silks are extremely fashionable. The stripes are generally very broad, of colours contrasting well one with another. Chequered silks, intended for a plain style of walking dress, are frequently of rather small patterns. Those in which the chequers are of violet colour, green, or sapphire blue, are very fashionable either for morning, in-door, or plain out-door costume. The corsages of dresses of the description just mentioned are slightly pointed in front of the waist, and frequently have what is called a lancer basque, which terminates at each side of the waist, without being brought round to the front. Another style of basque, having the recommendation of novelty, is very small, and edged with a deep flounce, ornamented with fringe or with any other kind of trimming employed on the flounces of the skirt. This kind of basque has the appearance of belonging to the skirt of the dress rather than to the corsage.

We may mention that plain silk, of one colour, which has not been passé de mode, has recently recovered some degree of favour. Several ladies of high fashion have recently had dresses of plain silk trimmed with silk of another colour, forming a contrast with that of the dress. A dress in this style has been made of silver grey, and trimmed with pink silk. The trimming in the skirt consisted of [illegible] and the sleeves were formed of puffs and frills of the two colours [illegible] posed alternately.

Silk embroidery was never more fashionable than at the present time. This rich and elegant ornament is employed in trimming in a variety of styles. Quilles and flounces are elaborately embroidered. The front breadth of a silk dress is frequently covered with this embroidery, and it is a favourite trimming for basquines and mantelets. Not only is embroidery employed in a vast variety of ways, but the work itself appears in a diversity of new styles and patterns. Sometimes it is light and delicate, presenting almost the appearance of lace; at other times it is rich and massive, and rising in bold relief from the surface of the silk on which it is wrought. Embroidery is now usually worked in common sewing silk, but many of the most fashionable have recently executed in the chenille. We have seen several very pretty mantelets made of coloured net, the [illegible] covered with chenille embroidery in a lozenge pattern, and in each space a spot or twig worked in silk. These mantelets are edged with very broad silk fringe.

At the ball given at the Hôtel de Ville, in Paris, in honour of the Grand Duke Constantine, it was remarked that white dresses [illegible] by coloured trimmings, predominated over those [illegible] coloured material. [illegible]

[illegible] The sleeves were formed of three [illegible] puffs with puffs of white [illegible]. The head-dress consisted of [illegible] of scarlet geranium, interlaced with pearls. Loops of pearls hung down over the back of the neck and on one side there were [illegible]. Another rich [illegible] dress, worn on the same occasion was of blue silk. The skirt was entirely covered with narrow flounces of Mechlin lace, [illegible] at intervals these flounces were fastened up by bows of silver lamé ribbon. A wreath of blue roses with silver foliage formed the coiffure.

Several young ladies wore dresses of white tarlatane, with flounces edged with broad hems, within which were runnings of coloured ribbon.

We must not omit to mention an exquisite fan belonging to a lady who attended this ball, the history of which is well authenticated. It once belonged to Mdme. de Pompadour, who bequeathed it to Mdme. de Haussat, from whom it has been transmitted to its present possessor. The mounting is tortoiseshell, richly inlaid with gold. The painting which adorns the fan itself is a genuine Boucher, and an example worthy of it. The pin which holds the sticks together is headed with [illegible] of large size and considerable value. The case appertaining to this fan is made of sandal wood, and it is a marvellous specimen of Chinese [illegible] work. It is indeed, so curious and beautiful that when the fan is taken out it must be matter of regret to leave the case at home.

THE TOLL-BAR NUISANCE.

WHETHER in town or country the toll-bar is a barbarous nuisance. Money must, of course, be had for the construction and repair of highways; but is it necessary to collect it on that old system of "stand and deliver," in which Claude Duval and Dick Turpin were such illustrious adepts? If we calculate the number of toll-bars, gates, and pikes throughout England and Wales, we shall find that there cannot be fewer than eight or ten thousand people whose sole occupation is to obstruct the traffic and annoy the traveller. At fifty pikes to each of the fifty-two counties, and three persons to each pike—a calculation which we believe to be greatly under the mark—we should have an array of 8000 persons living out of the produce of the tolls, doing nothing for the maintenance of the roads, and good for nothing but to collect the moneys, which, if levied as a highway rate on the parish, might be collected along with the assessed taxes or the poor-rates, without rendering necessary the employment of an extra individual. If an army of collectors were employed to visit people at their dining or supper tables, and to levy the tax or duty on wine and spirits at the very moment of their consumption, the system would be scarcely a whit more barbarous—though, possibly, in a slight degree more costly and vexatious—than the toll-bar system now in operation throughout these civilised islands. There is a cry to reform the toll-bar system. The cry should be to abolish it altogether. To reform it is impossible.

But, annoying as the obstruction is in the remote rural districts, it is infinitely worse within the populous boundaries of a town or a great city. So insufferable was the infliction felt to be, and so injurious to the interests of trade, that within the limits of towns and cities toll-gates were long ago abolished by our forefathers. Who could tolerate a toll-bar in his way from Westminster Hall to the Bank, or from Charing cross to St. James's Palace? We have but to fancy what uproar, what confusion, what annoyance, and what impediments would be created in our crowded thoroughfares by such a mode of raising money to repair the pavements, to understand at a glance all the multifarious objections that may be raised against the pike either as a national or as a local institution. Within the limits of the ancient city of London there are no toll-gates; and if, as it would have done under a proper system of government, the City Proper had grown into the Metropolis, and included Westminster, Lambeth, Finsbury, Marylebone, and the Tower Hamlets, which form the London de facto, though not the London de jure of our day, we may be quite certain that turnpikes and toll-gates would have been excluded from the great, as they are from the small, City, and from the modern, as well as from the ancient, Metropolis.

In another portion of our Paper will be found the Statement which has been put forth by a Committee of members of Parliament and others, who seek the abolition of all toll gates and bars within a radius of six miles from Charing-cross, particularly on those roads north of the Thames which are now out of debt. To that statement, and to the map which illustrates the extent of the nuisance which the Committee desire to remove, we refer those who take an interest in the subject, and who have suffered from the evil complained of. They will there find the case clearly stated, and will be enabled to supply themselves with arguments in favour of the abolition, not only within the radius laid down by the Committee, but throughout the much more extensive circuit of the British Islands.

Like all other fiscal errors, the operation of the toll-bar system is infinitely more oppressive than it was intended to be. Its object is merely to collect a revenue for a specified purpose; but, like the Corn-laws, or the Excise-duty on soap, and many other imposts now happily repealed, it has interfered with the comfort, the health, the morality, and the trade of the people, and done mischief in a thousand ways which were never contemplated by its originators and upholders. It will tend to simplify the subject if we take a few of the most prominent objections seriatim:—

Firstly. The system is costly. Within a radius of four miles of Charing-cross, as stated by the Committee, there are eighty-seven gates and bars. The money that was expended in the erection of these gates and bars, that is expended in maintaining them, and that is paid in wages or salaries to the men and boys, amounting to more than two hundred, who are employed to look after the traffic, is sheer waste of resources. The collector of the assessed or any other parochial taxes might collect all the money, if the roads were made or kept in repair by a highway or road rate, and all the money thus collected would be expended, as it should be, on the maintenance of the roads.

Secondly. The system is vexatious. Everybody feels this to be the case. The nuisance is so obvious and so palpable that it does not need to be insisted upon.

Thirdly. Under the false pretence of making none pay for the roads but those who ride or drive upon them, the system increases the price of food and other necessaries, not only to the dwellers within but to the dwellers without the toll-gates. The market gardener, driving his cart into town with his potatoes, his cabbages, or his fruit, adds the amount of the toll—and something more—to the price of his commodities; and the poor family—far too poor ride, but not too poor to consume vegetables—pays the penalty In like manner the dweller beyond the gate pays an increased price for all articles of town manufacture, especially for those which are too bulky to be sent out by a pedestrian messenger.

Fourthly. Wherever a toll-gate is erected within the limits of this fast-growing metropolis, it depreciates existing property, and prevents the extension of building. Those who remember Tyburn-gate, close to the spot where the Marble Arch now stands, will recognise the extent of the evil. Respectable London may be said to have ended at the corner of the Edgware-road. Westward of that point—where now stand rows of palaces, and some of the finest squares, crescents, and streets in the world—were to be found either corn-fields or vegetable crofts, or buildings of the most inferior description; mean public-houses and squalid tea-gardens, the resort only of those who could walk to them, and never frequented by any one rich enough to ride his own horse or sit in his own vehicle. But, when the bar was removed, Tyburnia—the noblest and most magnificent suburb of London—speedily arose beyond its boundary. Many other examples might be cited, but this will suffice for our purpose. And, while such was the operation of the system outside of the toll-bar, its operation inside was equally injurious, but in another mode. Those persons who carried on trades which compelled them to employ horses and carts for the conveyance of materials naturally desired to avoid the constant nuisance and infliction of the turnpike. Hence stables, cowhouses, slaughter-houses, melting-houses, knackers' yards, and other necessary abominations, instead of being removed with their filthy smells to a safe distance from the habitations of men, were established, where unfortunately they still remain, within the limits of the toll-bar. How much these tend to depreciate the property around them—how injuriously they affect the comfort and the health of the population—we need not more particularly point out. Almost everybody has felt and suffered from them; though few, perhaps, have considered that it was the ubiquitous "turnpike" that was the original cause of the mischief.

This list of grievances might be extended much further; and were it our present object to show the evils which turnpikes inflict upon the rural districts, and the vices and immoralities of which they are the nests, or the causes, we might exhaust our space long before we had exhausted the catalogue. When the metropolis shall have been freed from the infliction it will, perhaps, be time enough to take up the general question. The thoroughfares of London need many reforms. This immense city requires new arteries for its increasing traffic, new and larger main streets, and at least half a dozen new and toll-free bridges; but of no reform does it stand in more urgent need than the total abolition of Tolls. The matter is a practical one, and appeals to the common sense and the daily interests of a practical people. As such it will be considered. There may be difficulties in the way, but none that will very severely try the wisdom of Parliament. "Down with the Turnpikes! and Palmerston for ever!" would be a homely cry, but it would be effective. But, as the Premier is sufficiently popular already, we recommend the subject to Sir George Grey, as more strictly within his department. It is, in reality, a matter of police; and the only wonder is that it escaped the notice of Sir Robert Peel when he abolished the ancient "Charleys." London wants a Minister who in like manner shall abolish the "Pikemen." There is likely to be no greater practical difficulty in the one case than there was in the other.

VISIT OF THE GRAND DUKE CONSTANTINE TO HER MAJESTY.

THE visit of his Imperial Highness to her Majesty at Osborne will be found detailed in the Supplement (p. 552) published with the present Number. Of his Imperial Highness a memoir appeared in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for July 9, 1853. He will attain his thirtieth year in September next. Whilst Alexander II. is the son of a Grand Duke, Constantine is the son of an Emperor—for Nicholas was on the throne when he was born—and arose the paradoxical supposition of his having more right to reign than his elder brother; but he soon convinced himself that his father was also born when Paul was only Grand Duke. Still, Constantine entertained hopes of superseding Alexander, and, when his father once reproached him for his want of respect towards his first-born brother, he replied that he himself was younger than his uncle Constantine, who, however, was not allowed to become a Cæsar. The Grand Duke Constantine placed himself at the head of the Russian party, leaving the Germans to his brother Alexander. But all rivalry between the two brothers ceased at the death-bed of their father, who made his sons promise to live in concord together.

If the mentor of Alexander II. was a post of melancholy turn of mind, the tutor of Constantine was a practical man, Admiral Lutzke, who circumnavigated the world.

Constantine was always the favourite of his father, who recognised in him some of his own energy: he is, indeed, the strong mind of his family His examination was much talked of in St. Petersburg, for he astonished many by his cleverness; he spoke largely upon diplomacy, and the Emperor Nicholas said, "The best diplomacy is a good army."

The Grand Duke, who succeeded Prince Menschikoff in his post of Marine Minister, is very familiar with his fellow-officers, and is therefore very well liked by them. He is President of the Geographical Society in St. Petersburg, and has greatly contributed to some parts of the Russian empire being better known. He married, in 1848, the Princess Alexandra of Saxen-Altenburg, by whom he has a son (the Grand Duke Nicholas) and two daughters, the Grand Duchesses Olga and Vera. He is stated to know English better than any other Russian.

THE AUSTRALIAN MAIL SERVICE.—In consequence of the break-down of the Australian mail-steamer Oneida there will be no outward overland Australian mail dispatched on the 12th inst. The European and Australian Mail Company will dispatch a steamer this month to Australia vid the Cape of Good Hope, which will convey the mail which should have gone by way of Egypt.

EMIGRATION TO AMERICA.—Early this week three vessels left Liverpool for America with a total of 1185 passengers. The screw steamship Ahersonese, Captain Powell, belonging to the North Atlantic Steam Navigation Company, sailed on Monday for St. John's, Newfoundland, Halifax, and Portland. She had on board, in addition to a large cargo of merchandise, 425 passengers. The Royal Mail screw steam-ship North American, Captain Grange, belonging to the Montreal Ocean Steam Navigation Company, sailed on Wednesday for Quebec and Montreal, with about 300 passengers, the Canadian mails, and a full cargo. The Liverpool and Philadelphia Company's screw steam-ship Kangaroo, Captain J. M. Jeffrey, also sailed on Wednesday for New York, with 460 passengers and a full cargo.

A PRESENT FOR THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.—There is now at the United States' Marshal's Office, received by the George Law, a chair intended for the President of the United States. It is made entirely from the horns of two buckdeer, shot in Humboldt Bay, Humboldt county, California, 220 miles above San Francisco. The deer from which the horns were cut were the size of middle-sized ponies. The box in which it is inclosed is itself a curiosity, the sides being one single piece of about five feet square each, from the enormous red-wood tree of California. It is in charge of the donor, who is a genuine hunter, and who shot the deer himself. He is about six feet high, his face is covered with hair, and he wears buckskin hunting coat, &c.

FIFTY WORKMEN KILLED IN A TUNNEL.—On Thursday week, in the excavation of the railway tunnel at Hauenstein, in Switzerland, the tunnel suddenly fell in, and almost the whole of the labourers who were at work were either crushed to death or stifled. About fifty are believed to have perished.

THE cholera has again broken out at Demerara with great violence.

FRANCE.

The Minister of the Interior has addressed to the prefects a circular on the forthcoming elections, from which we give the following brief extracts:—

By the terms of the constitution and the decree of March the Legislative Corps, nominated in 1852, has finished its mission. Its members are now about to elect its deputies anew. The Emperor calls to the ballot-box nine millions of electors, and demands from all of them an act of confidence. . . The electoral lists have been drawn up largely and liberally. Every one having the right has been able to get himself admitted upon them. 9 521,220 citizens have been registered in them. On the day of election the vote will be secret, and the ballot-boxes will be opened in the sight of all. The truthfulness and independence of the vote are therefore guaranteed. . . Saving some exceptions commanded by special necessities, the Government has deemed it just and politic to present for re-election all the members of an Assembly which has so ably seconded the Emperor and served the country. In the face of these candidatships, openly acknowledged and resolutely sustained, the opponent candidatships may freely come forward. . . . The imperceptible minority of the hostile parties, if it dares to come forward, will be drowned in this immense popular manifestation, and it will be for the world a grand and eloquent spectacle to see nine millions of electors, in this country once so easily disturbed, coming peaceably at the voice of the Emperor, and bestowing upon their deputies for six more years the mission of faithfully seconding him in his constant efforts for the glory and prosperity of France.

The trial of the conspirators called the Franco-Juges was concluded in Paris, on Friday evening, the 29th ult., before the Court of Correctional Police. It was proved that they met by night to enrol members outside the walls of Paris; that they were masks, and were otherwise disguised. Their object was the establishment of a democratic and social republic: and their pass-words were "Courage," "Vengeance," "Allband," "Pianori," "Milano." Of the forty-five arrested six were acquitted. Ravel, Desmoulins, Antonegra, François, and Joseph, proved to have been the chiefs of the secret society, were sentenced to periods of imprisonment varying from four years to eighteen months, and to pay fines varying from 500f. to 200f. The remainder were sentenced to imprisonment for periods varying from two years to six months, and to fines varying from 300f. to 100f.

The French Minister of Justice has issued a circular desiring all judges and magistrates not to make use of any other names, titles, or particulars than those appearing in the certificates of their birth. The circular, however, is a step in the only practical course to be taken for checking the assumption of false titles.

The Senatus Consultum passed at the last sitting of the Senate is thus worded:—

Article 1. Art. 35 of the Constitution is modified as follows:—"There shall be one Deputy in the Legislative Body for every 35,000 electors nevertheless, there is given one Deputy more to each of the departments in which the number of the electors exceeds 17,500

Art. 2. An Imperial decree will regulate the list of deputies to be elected in each department, in conformity with the present Senatus Consultum.

The French Minister of War has addressed a circular to the generals commanding divisions, prefects, sub-prefects, &c., ordering that the number of young men of the class of 1856 to be left at home by way of support to their families is to be increased from one to two out of every hundred, making 2000 on the contingent of the class.

The Moniteur publishes the reports of Generals Renault, Macmahon, and Yussuf, who commanded the three divisions which, under the orders of Marshal Randon, attacked on the 24th of May the positions of the Kabyles in the mountains of Ait-Akerma and Afenson with complete success. Their loss was one officer killed (Major Boyer, of the 55th Regiment of the Line), and three officers wounded, sixty-four privates killed and 414 wounded. A subsequent despatch, received by telegraph from Marshal Randon, dated from the camp of El-Hadj-Ali, the 26th of May, announces that the Beni-Raten were beginning to come to terms.

THE KING OF BAVARIA IN PARIS.—The King of Bavaria will prolong his stay in Paris, it is said, to the 12th inst. On Sunday, after hearing mass at the Tuileries, the King visited the Palace of Versailles. Two hours and a half were devoted to the historic galleries on the ground floor. At five o'clock the King dined at the Palace of St. Cloud, and returned in the evening to Paris. On Monday morning the King of Bavaria, accompanied by Count Tascher de la Pagerie, went over the gallery of modern pictures, the palace, and the gardens of the Luxembourg. In the afternoon his Majesty went to Malmaison, where he visited her Majesty Queen Christina. In the evening the King dined with the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The review of cavalry, on Tuesday, in his Majesty's honour, came off on the new racecourse in the Bois de Boulogne. The cavalry consisted of two regiments of carabineers, two of cuirassiers, two of hussars—also of the regiments of the Empress, the lancers of the Guard, and six batteries of horse artillery. The movements having concluded, the Emperor, the Empress, the King, and their staff placed themselves near the stands of the racecourse, and the whole body of cavalry filed off before them in the usual way. On Friday his Majesty attended a grand ball at the Palace of St. Cloud.

BELGIUM.

Great excitement has lately prevailed in Brussels and other parts of Belgium, having its origin in the debate in the Chambers on the bill authorising the tenure of real property by religious and charitable institutions. Ministers carried the principle of the bill on Wednesday week by a majority of 60 to 41; but the Opposition minority continued the discussion with much bitter invective, which was brought to a crisis when the most conspicuous of its members, M. Frère Orban, on Wednesday, characterised the guarantee offered by Government for the production of the accounts of charitable institutions before the local Burgomaster as an insulting farce. This was received with applause by the strangers in the gallery, who commenced yelling and stamping. The President gave orders to the huissiers to clear the gallery, and the public slowly withdrew. After a few minutes had elapsed, and before the excitement created among the members of the Chamber by this incident had subsided, a great number of men with their hats on forced their way into the galleries, and it was necessary to have recourse to the gendarmerie to clear the Chamber, and orders were given to strengthen the military posts outside. Half an hour after this second disturbance the President resumed his seat, and the discussion recommenced. Meanwhile the public, after having been expelled from the House, assembled in noisy and agitated groups in the space which separates the Park from the Chamber. Above a thousand persons belonging to respectable classes of society congregated round the steps of the Chamber, and awaited the close of the sitting. No sooner had the proceedings terminated, and some members of the Right departed, than a storm of hisses and yells arose from the crowd. The members of the Left were received by the crowd with enthusiastic cheers. M. Rogier, on appearing on the steps, was the object of a frantic ovation; but he retreated before the welcome which awaited him, and left the Chamber by a private gate. The crowd, after waiting in vain for M. Frère, proceeded to his residence, where it sang the "Brabançonne" under his windows, and indulged in innumerable "vivats." The crowd next proceeded to the residence of M. Verhaegen, and favoured him with a similar manifestation; it then dispersed in the utmost order. During the above scenes the troops were ordered to remain in barracks, ready to act should circumstances unfortunately demand their interference.

The manifestations were renewed on Thursday and Friday on a larger scale. Detachments of twelve to sixteen of mounted gendarmes continually patrolled the streets, which did not, however, prevent from time to time large numbers assembling and passing through the streets and singing the "Marseillaise Hymn" and others of an exciting kind. The hotel of the Minister of Justice was attacked furiously; many of the windows were broken, as were those of the Jesuit College and the Capuchin Monastery, &c.

On Saturday the excitement somewhat subsided on the King issuing a decree proroguing the sittings of the Chamber for an indefinite period. After reading the decree the President proposed three cheers for the King. The Opposition members of the Left rose and cheered, while the members of the Right did not respond to the appeal.

The excitement extended to Antwerp, Mons, Liège, and Ghent. At Antwerp all the windows of the College have been smashed. The streets had to be cleared by the troops, but it does not appear that any collision had taken place. The people retire before the troops and then reassemble.

Tranquillity appears to be restored, but a portion of the Civic Guard is still under arms at Brussels, and troops are ready for any emergency. Some seventy individuals had been arrested, but the greater part of them had been set at liberty. At Liège, where the windows of the Bishop's palace were smashed by a volley of stones, the excitement is also subsiding. The reports from Mons, Ghent, Antwerp, and other towns in the provinces are also of a tranquillising nature.

SPAIN.

Nothing of interest has taken place in the Chambers since our last publication: the bickerings of the members still continue. The following is the reply which the Queen gave to the deputation of the Senate charged to present to her Majesty the Address of that body:—

Senators,—I have heard with the greatest interest the noble sentiments of the Senate. My sole desire is to see the nation united, prosperous, and happy. The wishes of the Senate are mine and those of my Government. I hope that, being all united, and having confidence in the assistance of Divine Providence, we shall advance towards the noble object which we all desire to attain.

Some rioting took place at Granada on the 24th ult. About 200 "lads," after assembling on the heights which command the Alhambra, where they amused themselves by pelting each other with stones, formed themselves into a sort of cortège, and, descending the Faubourg San Cosello, proceeded to parade the streets of the city, shouting "Cheap bread!" In the lower quarters the women turned out of the houses, and exhorted their husbands and brothers to rise in insurrection, and die fighting sooner than perish of hunger. The people, not having obeyed a summons to disperse, were fired at by the troops, and four of them were wounded. On the 25th all was tranquil, but several persons were arrested, and others were expelled from the town.

THE PAPAL STATES.

The cessation of the state of siege in the Romagna, Ancona, and part of the province of Pesaro, being the only territories where it was still in force, has been officially announced. All the prisoners under trial by court-martial are to be delivered up to the civil authorities. Nevertheless, all cases of resistance to the armed force and of offences against the Austrian military are still to be under the cognizance of the Austrian courts martial

The raising of the state of siege at Ancona has, it is stated, produced everywhere an excellent effect. The Holy Father continued his journey amid the enthusiasm and respectful salutations of the inhabitants. It is said that he had been induced to change his itinerary, and that he proceeded from Fermo to Ascoli. He was to arrive at Rimini on the 30th of May, so as to celebrate the festival of Pentecost in that town. His Holiness is to make his solemn entrance into Bologna on the 7th of June. All his Ministers and a great number of Cardinals are to meet him there.

HUNGARY.

The Emperor of Austria has issued a supplement to his decree of the 12th July, 1856, by which property that had been confiscated as a consequence of the sentence of a military court was returned to several persons who were concerned in the rebellion in the kingdom of Hungary and in the Grand Principality of Transylvania in 1848 and 1849. He now ordains that the confiscated property in the hands of the State—in the same condition as it was when taken possession of—and all such produce and revenue of the same as had not then been received, with indemnification to the landed proprietors for the loss of their villeinage and socage, shall be delivered to the following persons:—1. All those non-military individuals who were guilty of high treason during the above-mentioned rebellion, or of other offences, not enumerated in the autograph letter of May 8, 1857, and who, for the last-mentioned offences, are still in prison, and all those military men who are now in confinement. 2. All those persons who are no longer imprisoned, but whose property is still under confiscation. The Emperor says—"In regard to those persons who, having been condemned by court-martial, are still fugitives, my legations and consulates have received instructions to accept their petitions for permission to return, for remission of punishment, and for the restoration of their confiscated property. I, however, reserve to myself the right of determining in how far the conditions of this my act of grace can be applied to those petitions."

The progress of their Majesties the Emperor and Empress through Hungary (as elsewhere recorded) was put a stop to by news of the serious illness of their eldest child, the Archduchess Sophia, who expired at Buda on Friday, the 29th ult., just after her afflicted parents had reached her bedside.

RUSSIA.

The official Gazette of Warsaw publishes an Imperial ukase, signed by the Emperor Alexander, and dated St. Petersburg, 17th (29th) April, 1857.

After referring to the Imperial ukase of the 27th May, 1856, which granted an amnesty to those Polish emigrants who had acknowledged their errors and applied for leave to return to Poland, the present ukase removes from all political emigrants the rights of their class of which they had been deprived, provided they had taken advantage of the ukase of 1856, and had returned to Poland before the present Emperor's coronation.

THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

The Session of the Legislative Assembly of the Ionian Islands was opened on the 20th ult. by the Lord High Commissioner, with a speech in which he announced that, the good harvest of last season having augmented the public revenue, the Government have been enabled to make a considerable reduction in the public debt; and, since the 1st February, 1856, the obligations contracted by the Ionian Government in London and with the Ionian Bank, at 6 per cent interest, have been paid off by the sum of £47,200. The actual capital owed at the present moment is £11,163 2s. less than in the year 1854, and £23,582 3s. 9d. less than in the year 1855.

TURKEY.

Nothing has as yet been decided with regard to the affairs of Moldavia. The old Prince Vogorides has succeeded in finding protectors for his son in the Ministry; and the dismissal of the Caimacan, which was at one time considered as certain, has been one problematical. The Turkish Cabinet is said to be divided on the question of the Principalities, and rumours of an approaching modification acquire every day more consistency.

The fête of Kadi Guidjeci was celebrated on the 19th, with very little pomp, all the preparations having been put an end to by order of the Sultan, in consequence of the illness of one of the Sultanas

A fire broke out on the 18th, in the faubourg of Pasnar, at Constantinople, by which a large part of that quarter was destroyed.

A shock of earthquake was felt at Pera on the 21st, lasting only a few seconds, and doing no injury.

PERSIA.

The ratifications of the treaty of peace were exchanged on the 2nd of May, at Bagdad. Great ceremony and mutual congratulations passed between the Hon. Mr. Murray and Jehangueire Khan, the Persian Plenipotentiary. High dignitaries of the Persian Court were sent to the frontier for the purpose of giving a formal reception to Mr. Murray, the English Envoy.

General Outram has evacuated Mohammerah, and taken his troops back to Bushire. The British were beginning to experience rather severe losses by disease.

INDIA.

The mutinous spirit in the army appears to have received a check. The fate of the 19th Native Infantry has frightened men who, whatever else they may wish, do not wish to cease to be soldiers. The 34th, though still sullen, are completely cowed, and the wavering regiments have made up their minds to side with the strongest.

Gholab Singh, the Maharajah of Cashmere, is believed to be on his death-bed. His nephew Jowahir Singh, has left Lahore to look after his own interests. His successor is his son, Runheer Singh, but it is not certain if he will succeed

Frusl Alee, the Dacoit chief who murdered Mr. Boileau, the Deputy Commissioner of Seroure, Oude, has been put to death by a band of Nepaulese who pursued the chief with his band into the Nepaul Jungle and cut them to pieces.

CHINA.

The news from Hong-Kong is unimportant. The Chinese warjunks and boats have disappeared from the neighbourhood of our vessels. The destruction of a few Mandarin boats and lorchas constitute the whole record of active service since the last mail. The report of the loss of the Raleigh is incorrect. She struck on a rock, on April 14, about twenty miles from Hong-Kong, and sprung a leak. She was beached near Macao. No casualty to any one resulted from the accident. Sir John Bowring has been in communication with the French and American Ministers. The former has received orders to cooperate with the English, but none has reached the American. Mr. Charles Markwick, the Government auctioneer, has been strangled by one of his servants, whilst lying ill in bed, for the sake of some little property in the house.

UNITED STATES.

According to the latest intelligence Lord Napier was still proceeding in his endeavour to reopen negotiations on the Central American question. The obstacle appears to be the refusal of the Republic of Honduras to ratify the two conventions relative to the Bay Islands and to Mosquito. The Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune says:—

Whenever the ratification of the Treaty between Great Britain and Honduras shall be received, all the obstacles to the completion of the Dallas-Clarendon Treaty, including all the amendments of the Senate, will have been removed, and Lord Napier will be enabled, in the name of his Government, to reopen negotiations.

The treaty of commerce between Great Britain and Honduras, together with the additional article guaranteeing the neutrality of the inter-oceanic railroad through the Republic of Honduras from Porto Cabello on the Atlantic to the Bay of Fonseca on the Pacific, had been ratified by the Honduras Government; but the two conventions relative to the Bay Islands and to Mosquito, which were signed at the same time, by Senor Don Victor Herran on the part of Honduras, and by Lord Clarendon on the part of Great Britain, in London last autumn, have not been ratified.

The rumour of Brigham Young having had to flee from Utah is incorrect. He still remains at the Mormon settlement, at Salmon River. For some unknown cause the Mormons at Bernardine and the surrounding settlements had been summoned to Salt Lake City. It is reported that Major M'Culloch has declined the Presidentship of Utah, and that recent information has caused a change in the policy hitherto contemplated, the condition of Utah now being such as to require vigorous measures. Troops in large numbers are to be sent thither, probably under command of General Harney.

A fearful riot occurred at Louisville on the 14th ult. The four negroes accused of murdering the Joyce family some months since were acquitted. One of them turned States' evidence, but his testimony was not legal or corroborated. There was considerable excitement about the court-house during the trial. About dark a mob broke into the cannon-house and got a cannon, which they placed in front of the gaol. Several shots were fired by the mob and from the gaol. The gaoler, fearing the escape of the prisoners, formally surrendered two of them, who were hung by the mob; the third cut his throat with a razor; but the negro who turned States' evidence was unmolested. The remaining negro implicated in the Joyce murder was hung by the mob next night, making three hanged and one suicide.

MEXICO.

It is stated that Crabbe's California filibustering party had been attacked at Corboras by the Mexican troops, and forced to surrender at discretion. According to one account, the Commander and sixty of the party had been shot. The Archbishop of Mexico has made full submission to the Government.

PERU.

At midnight, on the 20th ult., the steamers Apurimac and Huaras entered the port of Callao, having on board 300 of Vivanco's men and 200 officers. On the 22nd Vivanco landed his forces near the suburbs of Las Chacritas and Pescaderas, at half past five in the morning, consisting of about 300 men, who immediately marched towards the arsenal and mole. They were met by the Government forces, and a brisk fire commenced on both sides, which resulted in Vivanco's troops being compelled to retire, which they did, contesting the ground foot by foot, until they reached the hotel of Aranchiba, at the corner of the Plaza de la Iglesia, and from which they kept up a heavy fire on the Government troops. Another party of Vivanco's forces, who retreated by the Calle de la Mission towards the Plaza del Mercado, were defeated by the Government force and compelled to surrender. They were conveyed to the Castle. General Plaza, of the Government army, was shot; and General Lopera and Colonel Rodriguez fell on the Revolutionary side.

The forces from the Uoyali were disembarked, and held the guns on the mole against the Revolutionists. Generals Vigil and Maldonado were taken prisoners in the Union Hotel. Both of them were wounded. Vivanco himself did not disembark.

The combat lasted from five to eight in the morning, and during that time the steamers Apurimac and Huaras kept moving about the bay; after which they retired, but still kept up their steam.

AT OXFORD the prize for a sacred poem—subject, "The Death of Jacob"—was on Monday awarded to Charles Henry Pearson, M.A., Fellow of Oriel College, formerly of Sidney.

MIDDLE-CLASS EDUCATION.—An important statute was brought before congregation on Friday (yesterday) at Oxford University, connected with middle-class education. It is proposed that examiners shall be appointed by the University to conduct examination of persons not belonging to the University. The examinations are to be held once a year, either at Oxford or elsewhere, as may seem desirable, and are to be in two kinds—one for persons under fifteen years of age, and one for those above fifteen and under eighteen. Testamurs are to be given in each case, and on the senior class of students, when successful, the title of Associate in Arts is to be conferred. The proposal arises out of the movement with which the names of the Rev. F. Temple, the Rev. H. W. Bellairs, Dr. Hook, Mr. T. D. Acland, and others are specially connected. This important subject has also been taken up by the Cambridge University: the Council of the Senate has reported warmly in its favour.

TESTIMONIALS.—On Saturday, May 30, a new black silk gown, the result of a contribution by a select portion of the ladies of his congregation, was presented by a deputation from them to the Rev. T. J. Judkin, M.A., of Somers Chapel, Somers-town, as a testimonial of their admiring estimate of his long, able, persevering, and beneficial exertions, both in the pulpit and out of it, in the exercise of his sacred functions. A Bible, together with a handsome gold watch and chain, has been presented by the churchwardens and parishioners of Leigh and Broadwood (Worcestershire) to their late curate, the Rev. Edward Bradley, who has been presented to the incumbency of Bobbington, Staffordshire.—The Rev. E. P. Hannam, after thirty years' labours in the parish of St. Pancras, having intimated his intention of retiring to a less laborious sphere of duty, on Saturday last was presented by the parishioners with an address expressive of their sincere regret at his relinquishing the cure of St. Stephen's Church, accompanied by a very elegant silver font, inclosed in an oak chest, a gold watch, and a purse containing £160. At the same time an address was read, accompanied by a Bible and Prayer Book, from the curates formerly ministering under him.

SPECIAL SERVICES AT EXETER HALL.—The second of the Special Sunday Evening Services for the Working Classes was held in Exeter Hall on Sunday evening, when a crowd of persons, to the number of 3000 assembled in the hall; and it was remarked that more of the working classes were present than on the last occasion, and that the men considerably preponderated over the other sex. A half-past six the Rev. William Cadman, M.A., Rector of St. George's, Southwark, appeared on the platform, accompanied by the Earl of Shaftesbury, Mr. H. Pownall, and various other gentlemen. A hymn opened the service, and was followed by the reading of Romans, chap. iii. The Litany was next read, and, after another hymn had been sung, Mr. Cadman delivered a very impressive extempore sermon.

OXFORD DIOCESAN SPIRITUAL-AID SOCIETY.—A meeting, convened by the Bishop of Oxford, was held on Tuesday at the Sheldonian Theatre, for the purpose of instituting a society for affording the aid of curates to the most necessitous parochial clergy of the diocese whose limited means or the extent of their charge require such assistance. There were present the Marquis of Blandford, Mr. Gladstone, M.P., Sir W. Heathcote, M.P., Mr. Henley, M.P., Colonel North, M.P., Mr. Langston, M.P., Mr. Barnard, M.P., Mr. G. Harcourt, M.P., the Vice-Chancellor of the University, Archdeacon Bickersteth, Archdeacon Randall, the Rev. Dr. Jelf, the Rev. Dr. Cotton, and a considerable number of the gentry and clergy of the three counties included in the diocese. The right rev. prelate stated, and eloquently advocated, the object at the meeting. The claims of the necessitous clergy were also earnestly enforced by Mr. Gladstone. Resolutions in accordance with the proposed object were unanimously carried.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

PARLIAMENT has been enjoying the Whitsuntide holidays, and, having now met again, will work steadily on until the prorogation. There are no topics for faction, but several for earnest debate, before it, and some valuable legislation may be contributed to the statute-book if business be taken regularly in hand, and treated as business. At present the new Parliament has not shown much tendency to speechification, and it is to be hoped that the rest of the Session may be similarly characterised. The condition of the Scotch pauper lunatics has also occupied the House, and the accounts that have been given of the condition of these afflicted creatures excite a compassion which, perhaps, we ought not to permit to become indignation, considering how recently our own lunatic system has undergone the changes demanded by enlightenment and humanity.

Both Belgium and France are in different stages of political excitement—the former from a crisis which has been produced by the efforts of the priests to regain their power over the property of the faithful, the latter from the recurrence of the elections. It is not necessary at the moment to forecast the future of Belgium, inasmuch as the wise conduct of the King has put an end to the immediate difficulty. But we have little doubt that the never-tiring agents of Rome will renew their work, and, having a Parliamentary majority, will, with a semblance of constitutionalism, irritate the people until some revolutionary movement shall take place that will once more bruise the head of the serpent, and secure for the Belgians the religious freedom which they so well deserve to possess. In the French elections the Government interferes without disguise, "recommending" its own candidates, and it was for some time in question whether it would be expedient for oppositionists to come forward at all. This is now decided in the affirmative, and several gentlemen adverse to the present state of things will be candidates. One of the French papers deprecates opposition to a specific candidate being considered hostility to the Empire, and points to England, where the opponents of a Minister call themselves her Majesty's Opposition. But neither nation is in case to take political lessons or precedents from the other. France could scarcely, under existing circumstances, adopt our system of contested election; and if we, in England, have ever desired an autocrat to reign over us, it has only been that he might act as an architectural reformer. A Napoleon for a week, with full power to brick up one end of Holywell-street, for instance, and set fire to the other, would be a national blessing. Au reste, we are content with our own Republic—the only one in the world.

The Emperor and Empress of Austria have lost their infant child. To any parents, under such an affliction, the truisms of sympathy is due, and we should abhor the writer who would treat the topic with levity. For the young and bereaved mother no one can have a word save that of commiseration; and, if the melancholy incident teaches the Emperor to feel as he can never have felt before, he may have some faint—very faint—idea of what numbers of agonized parents endured when his brutal Croats, storming Vienna after the revolution, flung the children from the windows, pointed out to you from the heights near the city. A father who has lost a loved child will think twice, should the occasion ever arise to him, of loosing a horde of ruffians upon the homes of his subjects. So may the lesson of affliction be blessed to the Emperor and to his people.

The Duke of Cambridge has been presiding at the opening of a park, generously given by Lord Calthorpe, for the use of the people at Birmingham. H.R.H.'s addresses have been manly, and full of sound sense and good feeling, and he has been received with sincere cordiality—the humbler classes exerting themselves to give him welcome in a way they seldom care to do unless convinced that their visitor is "the right sort of man." Some of the poetry that has been composed in his honour, though not very well spelt, and not much composed in his honour, though not very well spelt, and not much composed in his literature, than the words of the opera libretti, has the merit of being to the point, and should be preserved by collectors as records of a Royal progress.

The great ship is now, and will be until it passes Greenwich Hospital, the great attraction for the Londoner. She is new advancing so rapidly towards completion that the preparations for launching her are being pressed on, and the slopes down which her gigantic cradles are to bear her to the arms of Father Thames are in a state of forwardness. Her preternatural size, if the word be pardonable, makes it very difficult to realise the actual fact of her vastness; and many persons own to a feeling of disappointment at first view, and afterwards to one of simple bewilderment. Perhaps the best way to obtain an idea of her immensity is to go underneath her, and sit with her mountain bulk above you, and looking along through the shores, soon to be knocked away, her apparently interminable length is forced upon you. Her graceful proportions also tend to destroy the impression of her bigness; and, despite your knowledge that she is three times as long the Monument, and that the walk round her deck is nearly a third of a mile, you seem to have beheld more impressive vastness. At this period a visit to her is peculiarly interesting; for, if you have the good fortune to arrive while the steam-machine and railway on her deck (themselves an engineering triumph) are taking up tremendous boilers and depositing them in any of her abysses as easily as a porter removes a portmanteau, you will be singularly impressed with the complete subjugation of power to thought. Of the millions of whitebait which, subsequently to visits to the great ship, are offered as sacrifices to her fortune—not without libation—it needs not to speak; indeed, every hostelry, haughty or humble, along the Greewich shore, is prospering in an unparalleled manner; and their hosts are in no hurry for the launch, which—unless the comet interposes—will be the final and crowning glory of the season. The more that those who are competent to form a valuable opinion of the Great Eastern see of her the more confidently they speak of the certainty of her being a most splendid success.

THE ART-TREASURES EXHIBITION AT MANCHESTER.—During the present Whitsuntide season Manchester has had a great accession of visitors to see the Art-Treasures. One excursion train from London brought thirty carriages full of passengers. The number admitted on Monday was 10,000, or thereabouts. Very few season-ticket holders, however, went on Monday, as a crush was anticipated. Several parties of workmen have been treated to the Exhibition by their employers; but complaint is made that they cannot enjoy their visit because no labels are attached to the paintings, and workmen cannot be expected to buy a shilling catalogue.

CRIME—ITS CAUSE AND PREVENTION.—Mr. Hodgskin delivered his second lecture on this subject to a numerous assembly, on Wednesday evening, at St. Martin's Hall, Long-acre. The chair was occupied by Dr. Charles Mackay. Great interest was manifested by the audience throughout the lecture, and deeply-important lecture, and at its close a vote of thanks, on the motion of the chairman, was enthusiastically accorded to the learned lecturer.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—Three new annual exhibitions to the Universities (either Oxford or Cambridge) have lately been awarded for the first time. They are open to competition for all boys, whether on the foundation or not, excepting such as may be elected to studentships of Christ Church, and are, two of them, of £50 for three years; the third, of £40, for two years. This will raise the elections to Trinity College, Cambridge, to something of an equality with those to Christ Church, Oxford, in value.

EN ROUTE TO CHINA.

EN ROUTE FOR CHINA: A CALM ON THE RED SEA

(From our Special Artist and Correspondent.)

I SEND you two Sketches of Life in the Red Sea. One, all calm and smoking after breakfast. Dr. Macpherson is standing up with the cheroot in his mouth. Looking over the bulwarks is our Arab pilot. Reading is going on. In the companion Sketch all are "seedy," with the heavy pitching of the ship by the head wind; some Lascars are cleaning our weapons, and, as you perceive, they are, at all events, not influenced by head winds, and, bedad! I don't think anything would influence them.

To our Correspondent's brief description of his pair of characteristic scenes of "Life on the Red Sea" we append a note of kindred interest from Dr. Bonar's recently-published work, entitled "The Desert of Sinai: Notes of a Spring Journey from Cairo to Beersheba":—

Our Arabs called the sea not the "Red Sea," but Bahr-Malak, the Salt Sea, in contrast to the Bahr of Egypt, that is, the Nile. Every few minutes varied the scene,—the clouds altered as the sun got low, and put on a darker tinge; the sky took on a silky softness richer than anything we had seen at home; the ridges of the hills came sharply out with all their dark ravines; till at length the sun went down behind Atakah, and the reflection of the last rays went and came, with a dull purple brightness, quivering for miles over the still face of the passive blue. Blue, I have called the sea,—yet not strictly so, save in the far distance. It is neither a red sea nor a blue sea, but emphatically green—yes, green, of the most brilliant kind I ever saw. This is produced by the immense tracts of shallow water, with yellow sand beneath, which always gives this green to the sea, even in the absence of verdure on the shore or seaweeds beneath. The blue of the sky and the yellow of the sands meeting and intermingling in the water form the green of the sea, the water being the medium in which the mixing or fusing of the colours takes place.

THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA IN HUNGARY.

WE are enabled, by favour of M. F. Kanitz, of Vienna, to illustrate, from sketches taken by that gentleman, two of the most imposing scenes in the recent visit of their Imperial Majesties the Emperor and Empress of Austria to Hungary.

The Hungarian capital is composed of two towns—the one, which is called Buda (Ofen), lies on the right bank of the Danube; and the other, which is directly opposite, is the new and well built city of Pesth. Buda and Pesth—the "Geschwester-Städte" (sister-cities) as they are called—are connected by means of one of the finest suspension bridges in Europe, which was constructed between the years 1840 and 1849, by Mr. Adam Clarke, after designs by Mr. Tierney Clarke. This bridge was the scene of a grand display of fireworks on the 8th ult. It is said to have cost some 4000 or 5000 florins; but the money can hardly be said to have been thrown away, for the effect produced was magical. As the weather was fine and warm, the people remained in the streets, looking at the illumination until midnight.

The large illustration at pp. 549-49 represents the grand entry of their Majesties on the 6th ult. The Imperial cortège entered the city by the triumphal arch, and, after having passed through some of the principal streets, crossed the bridge in the following order:—A band of Hussars, a detachment of Lancers, a detachment of Rifles, a "Banderium" of Cumanier, the Court trumpeters, Court gendarmerie, carriages of nobles, Prince Esterhazy in his state carriage and six, with twenty-five running footmen, and Prince Nicholas Esterhazy in a carriage and six, with twenty-two running footmen. The Primate of Hungary was also drawn by six horses, as was some other prelate. A small "Banderium" of Jazygier was followed by a Bishop on horseback, who carried before him a silver cross, which seemed to be as massive as an ancient mace. Behind the prelate rode the Emperor, in the uniform of an Austrian General; and after him came a brilliant suite. The next in the procession was the Empress, in the state glass-coach, drawn by eight magnificent greys. Her Majesty, who looked remarkably well, wore a Hungarian head-dress. The rear was brought up by the Court equipages, in which sat the ladies attached to the Court. That their Majesties were received with loud cheers and flourishes of trumpets need hardly be said. After having received the compliments of the authorities and nobility in their apartments, the Emperor and Empress, with their suite, went to the chapel of the castle, where "Te Deum" was sung.

The journey of their Majesties in Hungary has been interrupted, and probably indefinitely postponed, by the death of the young Archduchess Sophia at Buda, on the 29th ult. The Imperial travellers had arrived at Szegedin, a town on the banks of the Theiss, amidst a series of ovations, and were on the point of setting out for Tokay, when alarming news concerning the health of the young Grand Duchess caused them to return to Buda. She breathed her last in the arms of her august parents, who arrived in time to soothe the dying agonies of their child. The Archduchess Sophia Frederica Dorothea Maria Josephine was born March 5, 1855, ten months after the marriage of her Imperial parents. Their Majesties arrived at Vienna on Saturday last. As the little Archduchess Gisella, who is well, was fatigued by the journey, the Emperor and Empress passed the night in Vienna, and left for the castle at Laxenburg the following morning. The greatest sympathy is felt by all classes of society for their Majesties, and more particularly for the deeply-afflicted mother, who is not yet nineteen years of age.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, JUNE 6, 1857.

SINCE her memorable Revolution of 1830 Belgium has enjoyed so much prosperity and constitutional freedom, that the world has paid her the best compliment in its power—that of ceasing to occupy itself with her affairs. A green oasis of liberty amid the arid deserts of Continental despotism, Belgium, when not forgotten amid the whirl and uproar of contemporary events, has attracted the admiration of States less happy than herself; and proved, as Great Britain has done in a more eminent degree, the compatibility of freedom with order, and of the popular will with the stability of the Throne and Government. It is with surprise, therefore, that most people will hear of the sudden outbreak of popular commotions in Brussels—of the alarming aspect of public affairs for several days—of a crisis in the fortunes of the State that might have led to a Revolution—and of the equally sudden restoration of tranquillity by agencies creditable alike to King and to People, and of the happiest augury for the future.

If we look back a little we shall be the better able to understand the state of feeling which led to the events of last week in the Belgian capital. The Revolution of 1830 was directed against the King of the Netherlands on three separate grounds. He was a foreigner imposed upon the people by the Treaty of Vienna; he was a tyrant in attempting to introduce the language and the laws of Holland into Belgium against the wishes of the Belgian people; and, last of all, he was a Protestant, while the Belgians were Roman Catholics. Thus the nationality, the love of liberty, and the religion of the Belgians were each the levers to overturn his throne; and, for once in the history of Europe, the priests united with the populace and the middle and upper classes to dispossess an anointed King. The Revolution, thus aided, was eminently successful in its object; but the ultimate consequences of the employment of such auxiliaries as Roman Catholic priests were not slow in declaring themselves. Although the want of a Roman Catholic Sovereign was supplied by a Protestant King of unexceptionable character, it was decreed that his heirs and successors should be educated in the Roman Catholic belief. As regards constitutional liberty, which is notoriously a plant that does not flourish side by side with the priestcraft of Rome, the priestly party in Belgium, though not strong enough to overthrow it, were cunning enough, supported by the rural population, to diminish and to control it. For five-and-twenty years the struggle between the ecclesiastical and the constitutional parties in Belgium for the possession of power has existed with greater or less intensity, according as the elections to the Chamber of Representatives promised, or gave, the majority to the one or the other. In all cases the King has played his part with the discreet, kindly wisdom which is his characteristic, and, although a Protestant, managed to escape the anathema of the priests on the one hand, or the enmity or mistrust of the secular and constitutional party on the other. The Revolution of 1830 laid down as a principle the secularisation of charity; in other words, it introduced a law similar to the English law of mortmain, which rendered religious corporations, such as convents, monasteries, &c., legally incapable of receiving or distributing the bequests of the charitable. In this the Belgians but profited by the teachings of history, and avoided a great danger. But the priestly party, who, if they had their will, would cover the country with rich religious institutions, and hover around every death-bed to snap up the fortunes of the dying, never omitted an opportunity to defeat or repeal this law. Having succeeded at the last elections in gaining a majority in the Chambers, and consequently in imposing upon the King and the country a Ministry representing their opinions, they introduced a bill proposing that the Government should have the power, by a simple decree under the King's hand, of conferring on religious corporations the rights of private citizens, with all the privileges appertaining thereto, including those of possessing, inheriting, and receiving donations and legacies. The bill was cunningly worded; and, in answer to the opposition of the non-clerical and constitutional party, the priests had the ready reply—"Belgium has freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom in every thing but in charity; and, if charity be not free, where is the boasted liberty of the country?" But the Belgians, to use a common phrase, were "not to be taken in;" and when the principle of the Ministerial bill framed with this object was, after long debates, affirmed by a majority of sixty against forty-four, the impatience and exasperation of the people broke loose. The debates in the Chamber were interrupted by the angry exclamations of the public in the galleries. Menacing crowds, without concert with each other, gathered in the streets and public places. They hissed and hooted the Papal Nuncio, who had made himself too conspicuous in the agitation. They yelled at and pelted the Ministers if they showed themselves in the streets; broke the windows of a newspaper office attached to the clerical party, and of the Jesuit College and other religious establishments; and congregated in such numbers in the Grand Place, that the artillery and troops were called out to keep the peace. The spirit of the people was contagious; and similar agitation took place at Antwerp, Mons, Ghent, Liège, Charleroi, Namur, and even at Louvain itself, the head-quarters of Ultramontane theology in Belgium. In the midst of the alarm—which the merest accident in the world might have converted into a sanguinary insurrection—the King found a way out of the difficulty without doing violence to the majority of the Chamber and the Ministry of its choice, or to the unmistakable opinion of the people. He simply adjourned the Chambers sine die. By this expedient the obnoxious bill dies a natural death. If the clerical party are as wise as the King, the bill will not be revived, and the agitation of the people will subside. If they be unwise they will reintroduce it some months hence, at the certain cost of exciting new and more bitter hostility, not unaccompanied, perhaps, by a real insurrection of the people, infinitely more formidable in every respect than the significant demonstrations of last week. That the priests will renounce their favourite project we do not believe. That they will allow it to slumber for a while is probable. It will be the fault of the Belgians if the interval be not employed in strengthening the really Liberal party, and in teaching the Ultramontanists that they have mistaken both the time and the nation; and that Belgium, having acquired her freedom at the cost of her blood, is prepared to maintain it by the same sacrifice. In such a contest, if it unfortunately arises, King and People will be found on the same side.

THE Grand Duke Constantine of Russia, the fierce Muscovite, the representative of "Holy Russia" and all its prejudices, traditions, and barbarities, the doughty Admiral, the right hand of the Empire, has visited the Queen of Great Britain, and been hospitably received. It can scarcely be said that he has visited England or the English people, for his stay on our coast did not exceed four-and-twenty hours. He did not set foot on the mainland of our kingdom, and he was scarcely seen by any one out of the immediate circle of the Court at Osborne. His visit was a flying, almost a furtive, one; and it is impossible not to contrast its shortness and its privacy with the lengthened and public sojourn which he made in France. People cannot but inquire why there should have been such a difference, and whether it arose from any want of respect for, confidence in, or curiosity regarding the British people on the part of the Grand Duke; or whether his Highness, desiring to see England, as he had seen France, was dissuaded from trusting himself in our ports, our arsenals, and our capital, by representations of the probable hostility of the populace, and fears that his reception might have proved neither flattering nor hospitable. If any apprehensions of this kind swayed the movements of his Royal Highness, whether they were inculcated in him by others or were the natural growth of his own mind, we must say that he or his advisers do not understand the character of Englishmen. Certainly, during the late war, there was no man in Russia whom the British people, of all ranks and classes, would so gladly have beaten in fair fight, either on sea or on land, as the Grand Duke Constantine. The British Admiral who should have conquered him, either before or behind the walls of Cronstadt, would have become the idol of his countrymen, and would have ranked as a second Nelson, as popular as the first. But with the conclusion of the war the hostility of the English towards the Grand Duke came to an end; and if he had freely visited London, and trusted himself in our streets, the people, we are confident, would have received him, not only with courtesy, but with enthusiasm. The great mass of Englishmen are like the sailor in Dibdin's well-known song, who says,

> But, the battle once ended, the heart of a lamb.

If, however, it were not from any considerations of this kind that the Grand Duke refrained from visiting the people of England, but for reasons of State policy, and to cement with France a good understanding which he does not care to foster with Great Britain, the English people, without caring a straw for his policy or his determination, will think that he has been equally ill-advised. Admiral Napier is almost the only man in England who is of opinion that an alliance between Russia and France would do this country any mischief. England fortunately has greater allies than these,—in her own wealth, her own spirit, her own patriotism, and in the aspirations for freedom of all the peoples and nations of the Continent; to say nothing of those best allies, speaking our own language, which, in case of need, we should find on the other side of the Atlantic. But if there be not some occult political reason for the ostentation of the Russian Prince's visit to France, and the privacy of his visit to England, there has been a great want of judgment on the part of the Grand Duke, and of those who advised him, to make a distinction that, unexplained, looks both invidious and ungracious.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

WATERING PLACES BILL.—The Marquis of WESTMEATH moved that a bill to regulate the mode of bathing at watering-places be read a first time. The abuses that had occurred at Margate and Ramsgate during the last season were too well known to leave any doubt of the necessity for the measure.—The bill was read a first time.

SALE OF POISONS, ETC., BILL.

Earl GRANVILLE, in moving that the House go into Committee on this bill, explained that the object of it was twofold—to prevent the commission of murder on the one hand, and the grievous accidents arising from the unintentional mistakes on the other. The bill required that a person applying for drugs of a poisonous quality should have a certificate from a medical man, or from the clergyman of the parish in which the drugs were to be sold; or, to avoid causing two great inconvenience, from two resident householders. The seller of the poisons would also be required to make an entry, in a manner specified in the bill, of the person to whom they might be sold, his residence, and the quantity purchased. Such entries should be kept tcarefully in a book provided for the purpose. Again, there were provisions with respect to the shape of the bottles, and the colour of the coverings in which the poisons were contained. Where medical perscriptions were given, medicines might be obtained without any formality, and where persons were engaged in trades which required the use of poisonous drugs a similar facility would be allowed. At present there were 16,000 persons selling poisons in this country without any restrictions. The noble Earl concluded by moving that the House go into Committee on the Bill.

Lord CAMPBELL said that the bill was loudly called for, and that great good would be to follow from the passing of the measure.

The Earl of HARDWICKE thought if this bill were to pass half the chemists in the country would have to close their shops within six months' time.

Lord REDESDALE suggested that the bill should be sent to a Select Committee.

Earl GRANVILLE having assented, the bill was read a second time, with the view of being sent to a Select Committee.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

This bill was reported with amendments, after a speech from Lord BROUGHAM, who, though approving generally of the measure, took exception to some of its provisions.
